Better Treatment of Workers These Days

Noticeable Change in the Attitude of Capital to Labour. Some Reminiscences.

The change in attitude of capital to labour in the last 30 years, especially in reference to workmen's compensation in the case of accidents, is dealt with by "Grab Samples" in The Northern Miner last week, with a number of interesting reminiscences added. The article in "Grab Samples" says:-

"In the past thirty years there have been a number of changes in the attitude of capital toward labour. This monologue does not invite discussion of the more serious aspects of the relationship but rather of some of the sidelights. For example, workmen's compensation. This is an important bit of labour legislation, if you like, but in dealing with it reference will be confined to the lumbering, railway construction and mining branches.

"Anyone who lived in the northern towns during the era of big lumbering considerations. Safety regulations ar operations, of railway construction and compensation boards, controlled by the early mining activities will be able to government, assure fair treatment to recall the conditions that then existed all interests." for the labouring man. They will be able to bring back to memory the derelicts which the practices of the day created, broken men thrown out on society, to make out as best they could with missing limbs or a blind eye or a broken constitution. There was no organized effort made to compensate these casualties of industry such as there is today.

"In the lumbering business it was possible to utilize the skill of older or the maimed men at lighter jobs and in "Keepovers" or as watchmen. In railway construction work there was a ruthless weeding out of the unfit and a man had to be in perfect condition to carry on successfully. In mining much the same condition applied, although there were surface jobs available for the more favoured.
