

Conservatives Met at Kirkland Friday

Dr. McClinton Among the Visiting Speakers for Big Rally

(From Northern News)
 With an attendance of over 60, some of whom were guests, the Kirkland Lake Conservative Association met at the Odd Fellows' hall Friday night under the chairmanship of President Hugh Boyd to hear stirring addresses by Tom A. Magladery, former deputy minister of immigration, now district organizer; Dr. J. B. McClinton, of Timmins, district president; A. V. Waters, former provincial member for North Cochrane, and others.
 T. Church, local organizer for the mines union, was given the opportunity of talking on the labour attitude to the provincial Conservative party and stated that labour supported Hon.

Earl Rowe, Conservative leader for Ontario, in his recent pronouncement of the freedom of labour to organize. He said that the union and the miners would support Mr. Rowe on this, and said that the Conservative party "had a chance" if they will plan to raise certain questions in the Legislature to show their stand.
 There was some discussion of reduction of membership fees in the association, in order to enlarge the membership, but it was finally decided to leave this over to the next meeting.
 Reduction was discussed when Bruce Williams, K.C., brought up the matter, Allen Jack, Frank Huff, Jack Paige, the chairman, and Secretary-Treasurer Jack McFadden taking part.
Dr. McClinton Speaks
 Dr. McClinton who was the first speaker, complimenting the local group on its turnout, remarked that it was a good thing to keep active, although Heaven alone knew, while Mr. Hepburn might or might not know, just when there would be an election. "Without vision," he quoted, "the people perish," and went on to observe that while it was easy to criticize the past and review it in the light of history, it took more to plan and think for the future. Those who planned and laid plans, he said, succeeded where others fail. Thirty years ago Canada had been a land of great richness in its soil, but much of that had now blown away. Old Ontario had once been beautifully forested, now it was covered with the stumps of trees which did not all need to be cut down.

 Ontario needed a plan, a looking into the future instead of so much into the past. The North constituted the wealthiest part of the province, and attention should be paid to it and the three classes of men who made it—the prospectors, the investors and the labourer, whose working life was one of 20 years.
Cannot Live Alone
 "We have a leader," he said, "who has thought these things out. We cannot live alone—capital cannot live without labour, or labour without capital. In England they have successfully pursued a middle road which we should follow."

 Referring to the comfort of the new train, on which he came down, Dr. McClinton said that the railway service was being improved at the expense of the highway system.
 Surely there should be a definite road plan. He referred to the money taken in taxes from estates, and suggested that since many of these estates drew revenue from the North, the North was entitled to its share. He urged a ten-year plan on roads.
 He quoted the saying of a construction boss who was asked if, in building, he would use the same men who were wrecking a building, and who said: "No. They can wreck in a day or two what it takes other men years to build."
First in Seven Years
 Remarking that this was his first political speech in seven years, Mr. Magladery, after paying tribute to the outstanding qualities of Hon. Wesley Gordon, former federal member for the riding, Mr. Magladery suggested that enthusiasm from now on would undoubtedly mean the return of a Conservative member. Referring to Col. Drew's recent resignation from the party, he said that it was either because the colonel did not see eye to eye with Mr. Rowe on the question of union government, or because he did not agree with his labour policy. If the former, he was just out of step; if the latter, he had no alternative, because the Conservatives had always been the friends of labour.
 The speaker did not think that Mr. Hepburn was ready to put his record before the electors, but remarked that if he didn't face them before long they were going to catch him.
 To be fair, it was the noisiest government Ontario had ever known, one which in the Legislature had set a bad example to the provinces.
 Mr. Rowe he qualified as a level-headed farmer with great experience of public life. The "sunshine" or "moonshine" budget was his next allusion. On the books, a $9,000,000 surplus looked good, but it meant in fact that that much money had been collected from a people already overtaxed. From the business angle it was sound to show a small surplus, but in times of stress it was unfair to pile up in Toronto money which could be used in the North.
 The Hepburn government had last year collected $92,000,000 in taxes, whereas the Henry government had, as its highest mark, $50,000,000.
Largest Tax Increase
 This was the largest increase on record. Never were people taxed to the same extent—and to this was to be added the increase in gas tax and auto license revenue—$25,000,000 a year. True, there was reduction in licenses promised, but while he was in favour of such a move for automobiles, he objected to it for trucks—"those big trains which run up and down the highway, each doing more damage than 20 cars," most of them brewery outfits.
 Apart from that the cut in car licenses didn't help the North, where cars were only used 5 or 6 months in the 12, and the speaker went on to suggest periodical licenses for 6, 9 or 12 months.
 Mr. Magladery added that $21,000,000 had been transferred from the hydro account to create the surplus, "taking one $10 bill from one pocket and putting it into the other."
 Liquor had added $10,000,000 to the surplus, but the people of Ontario strongly disapproved of the administration of the liquor act, which, he said, amounted to wide open sale.
 Licenses were being granted not by the judgment of the department, but by the recommendation of local Liberal committees.
 Criticising the $1 a year appointment of Arthur Slight, K.C., as investigator for the T. & N. O., which resulted, he said, in the appointment as T. and N. O. Railway commissioner, Mr. Magladery said that if Mr. Slight had investigated the liquor situation he would have his name where he liked it, on the front pages.
 The speaker sharply criticized reduction in the forest ranger service in the bad fire season of last year, and condemned the sale to United States interests of 1,264,433 acres of timber.
 Stating that the Ferguson highway, left in fair shape by the recent administration, which had planned to maintain and improve it, had been allowed to go to ruin, Mr. Magladery said that he gave credit for the undertaking to do something about it not to Mr. Hepburn but to councils, newspapers and other influences of the North, which had openly talked of boycott and pressed hard on the requirements. Transfer of the Wasip from Temagami to its ultimate destiny as a power boat on a lake in Hon. Peter Heenan's riding, was another item mentioned.
 After discussion of the school tax question, Mr. Magladery passed on to that of labour, stating that Mr. Rowe's recent statement showed definitely where he stood—showed that he upheld the right of working men to organize (they have had it for 30 years) and to join any union best suited for them, but not to hook up with any lawless organization.
 Mr. Waters voiced eloquent criticism of the roads and Northern relief policies and discussed at length the repudiation of the Hydro contracts, which he said had ended with these contracts again being assumed.
 Visitors with Dr. McClinton were Dan Cameron and Bert Sutherland, a personal acquaintance of Mr. Rowe's in the latter's home district.

Suppose Cleopatra had to do Housework

Telling Housewives How to Budget Their Time. "Oh, Yeah!" They Say.

By Isabel Bacon LaFollette
 As I look over my files I come across a clipping from Dorothy Dix which amused me when I clipped it and I still find it thought-provoking, as she does. She says:

"The other day I was reading an article in which housewives were told how to budget their time so that no minute in the day should be lost or fall of its appointed task.

"According to this domestic scientist, the busy wife and mother should leap from her bed at 6.45. Say her prayers at 6.50. Take her bath at 7. Don her bungalow apron at 7.05. Run the comb through her bobbed hair at 7.10. Give the baby its bottle at 7.15. Put on the oatmeal at 7.20. Set the table at 7.25. Find husband's clean shirt and collar and handkerchief at 7.30. Get the children up at 7.35. Wipe Bobby's nose at 7.40. Tie Mary's hair ribbon at 7.45. Serve the family breakfast at 7.50. Get husband to work and children off to school at 8. Interview the butcher and baker at 8.10.

"And so on and so forth even down to an appointed 15 minutes for taking a nap and 15 minutes more for reading an improving book, and if any woman who religiously followed this schedule wasn't raving mad and throwing teacups at the wall by the end of the day, goodness only knows why.

"Now no doubt most women do lack order and system, and do fail to improve each shining hour as they should. Any efficiency expert could show them how they could save a lot of waste motion and get better results from their labour, but even so, what the housewife needs is not regimentation, but variety in her work. She doesn't need to be made more of a machine, but more of a human being.

"The trouble with housework is its monotony. It is doing the same old things every day, every week, every year that gets on women's nerves. Sweeping floors that have to be swept over again in an hour. Picking up papers and coats and hats that the next member of the family will drop. Cooking meals three times a day.

Scrubbing, washing, darning. Walking the endless treadmill of daily duties that seems to get nowhere, but that must be performed to keep the household machinery functioning.

"That's bad enough, but it would be the final straw that would break the female camel's back if the domestic woman had to do her work with a timeclock tied around her neck that she had to punch on the dot, and that kept her on a strain rushing to her chores and worried to death for fear she might commit the unpardonable sin of letting the baby's sun bath lap over on the sacred hour for peeling the potatoes.

"A witty English writer recently declared that even Cleopatra could not have preserved the beauty that age could not wither, nor the charm that custom could not stale if she had to live in a suburban villa and do her own housework. Eighteen months of monotonous drudgery would have done her up. This is only too true. And so the woman whose life must necessarily be narrow and her work repetitious does not need to be pushed further down into a rut, but to be encouraged to climb out of it.

"One of the reasons why women hate domestic work so much is because they make a fetish of routine. They feel that they must wash on Monday, iron on Tuesday, bake on Wednesday, no matter whether they are sick or well; or whether on wash day the springtime called to them to forget the clothes and go picnicking, or whether on ironing day they woke up with an inspiration for making over an old dress and an almost overwhelming urge toward the sewing machine.
