Twenty Juveniles Are Given a Second Chance

Twenty juveniles appeared in police court on Tuesday on charges of breaking and entering by night, and theft. Seven of the boys were charged with theft. They were either paroled for periods of three months or their cases were adjourned until called. The other thirteen, charged with breaking and entering, all were paroled.
The charges came as the result of police investigation of a series of break-ins that has occurred over a period of weeks. In each case the theft was minor, usually cigarettes and candy, but the total thefts amounted to close to $100.

Advertising in The Advance Has Helped Build Business

In reply to a rumour that Smith & Elston are moving from their present building at 71 Third Avenue, Mr. Elston said this week that there was no truth in such a story. "We are expanding out business, moving along in business, but staying at the present stand," he said.
"Possibly," said Mr. Elston, "someone noticed the large amount of materials being loaded on our trucks for the many jobs we have under way," added Mr. Elston, "and assumed that we must be moving our entire stock."
Mr. Elston added that the close contact the firm has kept with the public through regular advertising in The Advance over a period of years has built business up to new peaks.

Cobalt Council Refunds Chief Money Overpaid

Cobalt, Oct. 21.—(Special To The Advance)—Chief of Police Clarence Connolly has been reimbursed the money he overpaid the town of Cobalt in connection with a fine he collected on a drunk charge, but apparently he will be "out" the proportion which goes to the provincial government. At Monday's meeting of the council, application was made on behalf of the officer for refunding of $750, it being explained that, owing to an error, he had made two returns of the same fine. Council readily agreed to make the adjustment and in the discussion it developed that apparently there was to be no application to the Ontario authorities for similar action with regard to the 40 per cent. of police court financial hauls which the province collects.

About Wild Fowl in James Bay District

Led by the Sault Ste. Marie Star a number of newspapers in Northern Ontario have been "viewing with alarm" the wild duck and geese situation in the James Bay area. These newspapers may or may not be right about a "wild duck sanctuary" in the James Bay area, but it does not seem to be a matter of serious present import. The comparatively small number of hunters going to James Bay will not make an appreciable bit of difference to the number of birds at James Bay. There are literally millions of the birds at James Bay and the few hundreds that may be shot will not affect the number at all, let alone threaten extermination of the birds, as the alarmists suggest. It would be well for all interested to read the interview elsewhere in this issue, where W. M. Widdifield gives his opinion in the question. What Mr. Widdifield says in the matter is in exact line with the ideas of others who know the exact situation in regard to the birds in the James Bay area.
Like many other Ontario newspapers, The Globe and Mail notes what is said by The Sault Ste. Marie Star, but The Globe and Mail does not make the mistake of becoming hysterical about the matter at the moment. The Globe and Mail suggests that "the alarm is at least premature." There appears to be ample protection at present for the wild geese and ducks at James Bay, though the birds are not so fortunate in more Southern sections where the tales of slaughter are alarming to say the least. So far as James Bay is concerned, however, the birds show not the slightest sign of being exterminated. Anyone who has been at James Bay at the hunting season agrees that there are literally millions of ducks there, while the few parties visiting there do so little damage to the immense numbers of birds as not to be worth noticing. Those who go as far as James Bay for this sport go there out of a real spirit of sport. Indeed, there is more idea of sport than there is of potting anything like the bag limit. In each party, however, took its full limit of birds, the result would not be noticed in the immense number of birds at James Bay. Those honestly exercised in regard to game conservation, need not worry about any immediate danger to the wild ducks and geese at James Bay.
Here is the editorial from yesterday's Globe and Mail:
James Bay Wild Fowl
An innocent announcement some time ago that the Moosonee hotel, located where the Moose River flows into James Bay, had been purchased by a syndicate as a dwelling place for those interested in the hunting of wild fowl, arouses the opposition of the Sault Star. James Bay, it points out, is the "last refuge" of the wild goose and the wild duck, "the greatest feeding ground of water fowl on the continent." And there is vigorous protest against the vast area being thrown open to indiscriminate shooting of these birds.
Nature-lovers, who admire wild life for its own sake rather than as game for the hunter, will agree with this view. Gradually but surely, with the advance of civilization and its killing propensities, wild things of the forest and the air have been driven from their immemorial haunts. In older sections of the country close seasons have had some effect in retaining slower moving wild animals, but birds are more easily frightened away. Fusillades of shooting in the James Bay district soon would clear it of geese and duck.
Perhaps the alarm is at least premature. The handsome little hotel at Moosonee will not accommodate the host of hunters necessary to stampede their quarry. James Bay is 300 miles in length and 140 miles wide. Even at the mouth of the Moose River its shores are stern, barren, almost forbidding in appearance, and all the hunters the Moosonee hotel can house will be as a few specks in the wilderness of rocks and trees.
When the Ontario Parliamentary party visited James Bay a few years ago some of the members went north prepared for a bit of shooting. A few minutes before the home journey started this group returned, not laden with wild fowl, but carrying one solitary bird that looked like an emaciated snipe. So it may be that the feathered sojourners about the bay know how to look after themselves. Anyway that is what the Parliamentarians thought.
But there is strong argument for the Sault paper's contention that the James Bay area should be preserved as a sanctuary for wild fowl. If cleared out of that locality where are they to go? It is claimed that wild rice will not grow much farther north, and wild rice is the natural food for these birds. As they can't sojourn farther south, it may be that for wild geese and duck it is James Bay or nowhere else. This makes the situation serious. In their strange wisdom these birds have chosen James Bay and its environs as the best place for their summer nesting and the propagation of their kind. Anyway the use of decoys and "blinds" should be discouraged—but how, in so vast a territory? In every country harboring wild animals and birds the experience has been that the pot hunter doesn't know when to stop shooting. Even Africa has been obliged to call a halt to this indiscriminate slaughter. Good sportsmen will not do this, but all men with guns are not good sportsmen.
In urging that James Bay should be a wild fowl refuge "for all time," the Sault Star cites the experience of older Ontario. "A half century ago every lake in Ontario north of Lake Simcoe saw literally thousands of wild ducks and geese. The writer has seen Cunningham's Bay on Lake Couchiching covered with clouds of them. Now there are a stray few there in the fall. The pot hunter has driven them to their last trenches in James Bay. Destroy them there and there will be none left even in Northern Ontario."
The warning is definite and based on experience. If anything is to be done about these northern wild fowl a start should be made now. Growing interest in the protection of wild life in Canada indicates that action toward this end will be taken.

THE CONSUMER EATS & THINKS

"There's a chap works with me in the mine. He doesn't go to my church, and he does not vote as I think he should."
"I eat meat and he doesn't and when the British Empire is mentioned, we both get pretty hot under the collar for different reasons."
"We lived near each other and coming home each day our talk usually came near ending in a scrap, and once we actually matched fists."
"In some way we both joined the Co-op. He insisted he did it for one reason, and I for another, but we both got there."
"Three weeks ago we both happened into the store on Saturday night and I said to him "It's a great store we own, eh, Joe?" He said it was the biggest thing he had ever had a hand in."
"Coming home now, we seem to get talking more about the Society, what it's going to do for us and what we can do for it how to better it and who else we can get to join it."
"Somehow it never occurs to us now that we go in different directions on Sunday."
