The chairman then called on Chief Borland to make the presentation of the long service trophy to J. D. Mac-Lean, who for years was a prominent member and officer of the brigade, and who in more recent years, as town engineer, has given notable service to the firemen and the town. In his remarks Chief Borland referred to the time twenty-one years ago this summer when the brigade went down to Cobalt and "brought back the bacon." To him, he said, it revived many fond memories of Jack MacLean. The chief mentioned many of the happenings of that historic trip, and how the band had met the boys at the station on their return. In presenting the medal he expressed the hope that Jack would live long to cherish it, and that he

Councillor Eyre gave a recitation that hit with his wish to the fire chief :-

President Walter Greaves of the Canadian Legion thanked the fire brigade for the pleasant and inspiring evening. He thought the Legion and the firemen had one point in common; the Legion was trying to salvage the war veterans, and the firemen worked to save life and property. Mr. Greaves was heartily applauded for his vocal solo, "The King's Navy."

Councillor Eyre gave ar ecitation that made a hit, after thanking all for the invitation to be present at this event.

The body subsequently was released for burial and the funeral was arranged to take place this afternoon, with Rev. Charles Geer, pastor of the Baptist church, conducting the service at the Raeburn home here. Burial was made in Mount Pleasant cemetery. Mr. Mc-Leod, 47 year old native of the Mari-I times, had liver in this district for many years, most of them in the service of the power company in various capacities. His widow and two sons, Robert and Douglas survive.

The victim's body was lodged firmly against the racks which protect the chutes from logs and other debris, and when it was located a short depth under water, it required the services of several men to bring it to surface so strong was the current and the suction of the water at that point According to evidence given at the inquest by M. Piche, plant mechanic for the company, the ledge of ice was about six feet below the concrete pillars between which the racks are placed. The ledge was only about two feet in width and farther out was open water. Mr. Piche could offer no explanation why Mr. McLeod should have been down there, but told the jury he thought the victim must have slipped off the ledge as he turned to climb up to the platform above. There were no eye-witnesses of the tragedy and the alarm was raised when Mrs. McLeod who, with John Watters, assistant to her husband, was the only other resident there, thought McLeod was gone too long. According to Watters. McLeod had gone down on the ice three times previously, so far as he knew, and witness said this was dangerous. He had told McLeod it was not safe. Watters said, but the former had replied it was "all right" Watters said he had been at the plant four winters and always had broken the ice avenue. The young couple will reside from the platform above. Mr. Piche said he could trace McLeod's movements to some extent from tracks left in the light snow which covered the ice, on the ice ledge which had been frozen pole was nearby, Piche said.

Charles Phelps, superintendent of the Hound Chutes plant, who aided in the search for McLeod's body, considered the victim had slipped off the ice. Mc-Leod, who was said to be familiar with conditions at Ragged Chutes and who had lived there before, took over the superintendency on December 1, when his father-in-law retired after spending 25 years there. The party which went down from Cobalt when the call for help was received at the sub-station here took several hours to negotiate the ten miles over badly-drifted roads, but found the body within 20 minutes, the time being close then to seven o'clock.

This morning something happened to shake our faith. We read about an underworld killing in New York.

Now, in reading recent magazines, we have gathered the very definite impression that a man named Dewey had put all the underworld characters be-miles of New York with Dewey on the job—after reading the U.S. magazines. Down south of the border, where no

Why doesn't the government just buy everybody a new car and let them keep the old car for emergencies?
