Cobalt Prospector Drowned in Kenora

Gus Lindberg, Well-Known Prospector, Loses Life in Kenora District

Cobalt, March 3. (Special to The Advance)—News of the drowning at Kenora on Monday of Gus Lindberg, well-known prospector of the district and a man with a wide circle of friends in the mining fields, was received here later in the same day by his brother Nels. No particulars were given in the message, relayed from Northwestern Ontario through Mrs. White, a sister at North Bay, but Nels Lindberg said he thought it probable Gus was crossing the river near the power plant when the accident occurred. Mrs. White left for Kenora on receipt of the news. Gus Lindberg was 53, unmarried and a native of Cobden, and he had lived in Halleybury until seven years ago, when he transferred his mining activities to the Kenora section. Surviving are two brothers, Charles and Nels, and their sister.

Brampton Conservator—Canadian women use lipsticks. To what extent the facts have not been made clear by the dominion statistician. But, it is safe to assert, they are not so lavishly decorated by this means as are their sisters in the United States. A recent report issued by the Department of Commerce at Washington gave to the world the rather startling news that last year the money spent on lipsticks would have painted 40,000 barns. Nearly every one will agree that the money would have been a better investment if spent on the buildings. There are occasional evidences that even Peel and Halton ladies seek to improve their appearance with the use of this modern device. And many tempting lips are disfigured in consequence. The barns need the paint.

A fraternal service was conducted at the funeral parlors of George H. In attendance were officials of the Grand Lodge of Canada, all members of Prince of Wales Lodge, and representatives from other Masonic lodges in the Capital.

Huntingdon Gleaner—No longer will magicians in Germany pull eggs, rabbits, snakes or other living creatures out of hats or from behind the ears of small boys in public. The German government has forbidden such demonstrations as giving no aid to the Reich's five-year plan of building up production and industry generally to a point where it will be self-supporting. Evidently harmless, wholesome entertainment plays no part in this plan.

AS NORTH IRELAND VOTED

Viscount Craigavon, Prime Minister of Northern Ireland, shown in a recent picture in an informal pose with one of his grandchildren, exhorting the Ulster voters on the eve of election to repulse the "impudent challenge" of Eamon de Valera for a union with Eire (formerly the Irish Free State). He asked for a vote of confidence on that issue. The result was a decisive victory for Craigavon.

ROADS and RATIONS

When roads were long mud-puddles with ruts four feet deep filled in with boulders that snapped off axles, each village lived like a world in itself, as if built round with a wall. If a village had a bad crop, its inhabitants might starve, though the next village to it had the best crop in history. And if a village produced more than itself could use, the surplus rotted, for even though people starved in the next village, there was no way of sending it to them.

This was a fact in the Middle Ages; to us with railways and roads and aeroplanes, it seems strange enough to be laughable—but this inability to distribute the produce of the earth was tragic.

To-day, with all our inventions the harvest of the world's fields is just as badly distributed. We have many roads, it is true, but still people starve and crops rot.

Here is the reason. The roads by which these crops might reach the starving people are controlled by men desirous of personal profit, regardless of others. Only when these roads are controlled by the consumers will the goods which these consumers need reach them.

Your retail store is one of these roads. Where it is controlled co-operatively, each user-member of that store has one vote and only one in its control and only those who use the road share in the earnings from it.
