A TRIUMPHAL TOUR

Everybody expected that Their Majesties the King and Queen would receive a right royal welcome everywhere they appeared in Canada. But even the most loyal scarcely expected that the tour would prove so great a happiness to both Their Majesties and their people as it is actually showing itself to be. That is exactly what is happening. Their Majesties are undoubtedly having a happy time, and to the people it is the most wonderful occasion in history. It is worth while to consider why this is the case. In British hearts there is deep-rooted love for the King and Queen no matter who the rulers may be. To the average Britisher they are the symbols of the Empire, and of freedom, the law and order, the justice, the democracy, on which the Empire is founded. In the memory of no living man has there been a British sovereign who has not worthily upheld the traditions of the office. But to see the present King and Queen is to feel that never before were there greater grounds for the most fervent admiration and affection. Possibly courage is the virtue that British hearts most admire. Here are two brilliant samples of courage—the courage that faces duty gaily and with a smile. No one need deceive themselves that it did not take high courage to cross the ocean at this wayward time in the world's affairs—courage to face the grinding round of duties and of ceremonial that such a visit entails. For this alone, the King and Queen would be sure to receive the warmest welcome from all in Canada—the oldest Dominion of the Empire, as His Majesty pointed out.

But the visit of the King and Queen have passed beyond the mere question of loyalty. It is genuine affection that greets them now wherever they go. Quebec once more has set the fashion for all Canada. Quebec has not only showed its loyalty to the British sovereigns, but Quebec took the royal couple to its heart.

With literally thousands in this part of the North following each stage of the royal tour through the newspapers and the radio, it is difficult to find any person even in critical mood. The North was ignored by the politicians who plotted the royal itinerary, but the North has followed the royal visit with the deepest interest. Hundreds of women and children—and men, too—have been spending much of the day to hear the story of the King and Queen during the past week. Newspapers have been given the greater attention because they have featured so much about the King and Queen. But one grumpy fellow was discovered who did ask what all the fuss was about. It was a pleasure to answer him. He was told that the people—Canadians old and Canadians new—were not only honouring the King and Queen because they were the living symbols of the Great Empire founded on freedom and the hope for justice and the right, but also because they typified the virtues that have made the Empire great—the happy family, the understanding heart. The gentleman was told the story of the old lady—mother of gallant soldiers—who said after meeting the King and Queen at Ottawa—"I know now the real meaning of Their 'Gracious' Majesties. He was told, too, the incident of the soldier who was asked by His Majesty how many veterans there were in the group. The soldier saluted smartly and replied: "About one hundred, Sir!" An officer standing nearby rebuked the soldier for saying "sir," instead of using the term, "Your Majesty." Perhaps this would have spoiled the day for that gallant old veteran, but the Queen, who had stood by and heard it all, smiled at the old soldier. "It's all right!" she said, "We understand." "It's all right! We understand!" A glorious motto for a King and Queen! Is it necessary to seek further for reason why love is added now to loyalty.

A CAPITAL CITY

Ottawa has proven itself a capital city. Its welcome to the King and Queen left nothing to be desired. In that city symbolic of the heart of Canada Their Gracious Majesties (a true term that, and no longer a figure of speech) touched the heart of the people more closely and more completely than is likely to be the case at any other point of visit. It will be remembered long, indeed, how the Queen, leaving the bodyguard behind, wandered among the returned soldiers. And the King followed her. They strolled for half an hour or more among men who had proven their loyalty by risk and daring and service. Much has been made of the fact that the bodyguard was left behind. It would be more correct to say that the guard was changed from a few loyal soldiers to twenty-five thousand of the bravest and best, any one, every one ready to guard Their Majesties against all ill. The words of the Queen on another occasion might well have been used in this little incident: "It's all right! We understand!" Their Gracious Majesties understood.

They knew that with the veterans—loyal, disciplined, thoughtful, admiring—they were surrounded by loving friends and safe even from being jostled.

This incident of the King and Queen strolling unattended in a crowd of their own loyal subjects will be viewed by many as the highlight of the royal visit to Ottawa. To others the beauty of the city with its artistic decorations may be considered the outstanding feature. There is another feature, however, that The Advance believes should touch the pride of all Canadians. That was the remarkable special edition of The Ottawa Journal to honour the royal visit. An issue of over 100 full size pages, The Ottawa Journal special issue had much more than its size to commend it. In all the many special issues for the royal visit it is doubtful if one more interesting, more informative, more to be treasured as a souvenir for all Canadians has been published or is likely to be published. Profusely illustrated, with excellent art work, it is a volume of information covering the story of royalty and the royal visit to Canada. Interest, good taste and accuracy combine to make this special issue outstanding. It should be a matter for genuine pride throughout Canada that its capital city was able to present so excellent, so complete and so creditable a special issue.

VALUE TO CANADA

When that courageous young royal couple, Their Majesties the King and Queen, were given the wonderful reception accorded them in Quebec, followed by equally sincere and hearty loyal acclaim, in other places, the first thought in many minds was the effect of the unusual expression of loyalty and devotion on the lands ruled by dictators. "That, surely, will show that the Empire is united, loyal, devoted—that there is no slackening of the ties that bind the different parts of the Empire—that thoughts of disunity, of separation, of counter purposes, have no foundation in fact!" Expressions like that were frequent. There was also a belief that the royal visit would have a notable effect on other parts of the Empire and especially on the people of the British Isles. It was thought, and rightly so, that interest and friendship would be increased towards Canada as one of the effects of the tour of the Dominion by Their Majesties. There is every reason to accept these beliefs. But it might also be well to dwell a little on the direct effect upon Canada and Canadians. The royal visit undoubtedly is increasing the affection of Canadians for the Old Land and for the other parts of the Empire. To greet the noblest in the Empire naturally means added affection and regard for all the Empire. The visit will bind more closely together Canada and the other parts of the Empire, but it also bids fair to draw together in mutual understanding and respect the different parts of Canada, the different peoples of Canada. Is it more than logic to believe that that those who love the same ideals may easily love each other? Quebec's rousing welcome to the King and Queen set a high standard for the other provinces. In seeking to equal the loyal fervor of Quebec, the other provinces will feel a closer kinship, a warmer friendship for their neighbours down by the sea. The visit of Their Majesties will do much to emphasize the traditional friendship of Canada and the distant parts of Empire, but it will also cement more surely the various parts of this broad Dominion under a common loyalty, a common affection.

In many ways Canada is typically British. Perhaps in no sense is this more true than in the cosmopolitan nature of its population. The visit of British royalty to Canada will undoubtedly stir British understanding and friendship in a way that will unite more closely the New Canadians and those of older standing. On innumerable occasions. The Advance has emphasized the loyalty shown by the New Canadians. There was ample proof of the truth of this loyalty in the parade here yesterday, when the New Canadians took their part with a wholeheartedness that cheered the hearts of all who are truly loyal. Remembering that most of the New Canadians have the essential British hopes and ideals—love of home and the family, the passion for liberty, the desire to worship as their conscience calls, the hope for security, for progress, for happiness—it should be easy to accept them as true brothers, equal in respect and in affection. The New Canadians, if rightly welcomed and esteemed, will prove—as they have proved in the past—many at the risk of life itself—as among the most loyal subjects of Canada and the Empire. Canada has the golden opportunity today, through the visit of Their Majesties to this Dominion, to take to heart the lesson of the Gracious Queen's own words, "It's all right! We understand!"

GRAVEL AND SAND—AND PLACER

Recently The Sudbury Star expressed the hope that United States newspapers would not make the mistake of referring to "the King of England." Once such an error was irritating to the dominant partner in the "Tight Little Isle," but nothing will Scots care for such a slip, if only the newspapers will not forget to mention "the Scottish Queen."

The old tradition says that when Bonnie Prince Charlie was in exile and the toast was called for King George, Scotsmen saved their heads and

"Mother Was Irritable"

"She couldn't seem to interest herself in anything. Her eyes wouldn't let her read for long and her head ached when she did much knitting or fancy work. Her puttering around the house nearly drove us mad. Proper glasses prescribed by Mr. Curtis restored our happy home. Mother is perfectly content now. The cost was very little and we paid it in four or five instalments so that it seemed like nothing at all."

their hearts by toasting "the King," passing their glasses over the water decanters as they gave the toast, thus making it "The King—over the Water." Today loyal Scots may follow head and heart alike, by toasting a new and better King George as their "King over the Water." The old-fashioned suggestion has been made that in honour of the visit of the King and Queen to Canada that there should be a more or less general pardon of criminals in the penitentiaries. The parole boards seem to do enough of that without any excuse being made of the royal visit. This form of pardon as a royal favour goes back to different days and other conditions that have no application now. It might be all right in times when imprisonment for "political crimes" was common, but in these days when it is difficult to get the real criminals in jail or to keep them there even when they are imprisoned, this form of clemency in the name of the King is not to be desired. clemency or favour to those who have fallen foul of the law, why not confine it to the unfortunate: who have neglected to pay their income tax, or their sales tax or even their radio tax? That form of clemency would be royal favour, indeed. It would be long remembered by everybody.

Several newspapers recently have noted the fact that at the last session of the Legislature, Premier Hepburn said: "I have been banged around, called everything, but it doesn't bother me. They can say almost anything they like about me as long as they don't call me a Tory." This is a good thing to remember. There have been times in the past—and likely will be again—when many people just longed to know something to say that would really annoy Premier Hepburn. It is a pleasure to treasure up an expression that he admits will "get under his hide." Unless he walks chalk the happy premier may be assured that some at least will go the lengths of calling him a Tory—yes, even an Old Tory.

Huntin' don Gleaner: A new moving picture being made in Hollywood in which Bing Crosby and Joan Blondell are stars required an attractive baby boy in the cast, who would not be afraid of being handled by strangers. Approximately 1,000 mothers appeared with their babies at the gates of Universal City Studios. Only 50 of the 1,000 were chosen for screen tests, but not one of them met necessary requirements. A milkman, Ray Nenville, knowing one of his customers, Charles Previn, was the musical director at Universal City, got some snapshots of his baby and left them with the bottles of milk he delivered to Director Previn. The pictures got the baby a screen test that was so satisfactory the Nenvilles signed a contract for "Sandy" to appear in the picture at a salary of $120 a week for four weeks. After the contract was signed and the picture started, it was learned that the baby's real name is "Sandra" and that she is a girl. However, she has proved to be such a good little actress that this isn't going to make any difference with the director.
