

What is Wrong With the Mining Industry, and How the Assure a Remedy.

Quebec Mining Engineer Summarizes the Case for Mining. Something Must be Done About it, He Suggests, as No Business Can Use Up Its Assets Faster Than They Can be Replaced.

In the Advance in recent months there has been a discussion of the present situation of mining and the necessity for a radical change in the vital interests of the mining industry and, no less in the vital interests of the public. The actual situation has been pictured in these columns by old-time prospectors and mining men like J. W. Young, of Porcupine, F. M. Wallingford of Timmins and others, and these have also suggested remedies. The Globe and Mail and the Northern Miner have also been quoted in these columns, and remedies suggested. While there seems to be unanimity in accepting the proposition that some remedy is needed, it is apparent that mining, which is a "wasting" operation can not continue indefinitely unless new mines are brought into being to replace those that must eventually be worked out. The Advance feels that the greater consideration and discussion the better the chances of an early and effective remedy. Accordingly there is given herewith a careful and capable analysis by Geo. H. Salton, B.Sc. M. Sc., a well-known and able mining engineer of the province of Quebec, as presented in last week's Rouyn-Noranda Press.

The Illness—and Suggested Cure
It is comparatively easy to list many factors which together are responsible for a lack of interest in, and a rather unhealthy condition of, the mining industry, particularly that part of the industry upon which depends the finding of new mines. Some of these factors are:

(1) The present international situation.
(2) Taxation, reasonable and unreasonable certainties and uncertainties.
(3) Securities regulations.

(4) The increasing difficulty in locating new mines (due, of course, to the fact that the easiest ones to find are found at first).

It is, of course, clear to all that the most important single factor is the first mentioned. This, however, is beyond control and nothing can be done about it. At the same time there is no reason why steps should not be taken to do something about the less important factors. It is not to be expected that such constructive changes as are at present possible will provide any spectacular impetus, but at least the groundwork for a revival will have been provided in anticipation of the return, at some time or other, to normalcy in international relations.

It might be claimed by some that statistics refute (by a rising trend of production of mining products) the statement as to an unhealthy condition of the mining industry. It need merely be said that any industry that is using up a product essential to its life faster than it is being replaced can have only one end. For some years past the products of mining enterprises in Canada have been depleted faster than new sources of the products have been found; the forced draft due to war necessities under which known mines are now operating is only speeding up the ultimate end. While no one with any common sense claims that the potential resources available to Canadian mining enterprise are unlimited or inexhaustible, nevertheless present geologic knowledge, together with advances in the geologic sciences, clearly point towards a probable long and prosperous mining life for Canada—provided it is not stultified by unwise governmental restriction and bureaucracy.

Personally I am rather of the opinion that one of the reasons why nothing much in the way of constructive changes designed to add a degree of permanency to mining has been carried out by legislative bodies (while in the meantime further restrictive measures have been introduced) has been the fact that those making up the legislative bodies and perhaps even the public in general, have not a clear enough picture of just what mining means, what the term implies, and just what the industry depends upon for its very existence.

Although geologic knowledge may indicate areas possibly favorable to ore (ore, oil, etc.), the search which still remains, by comparison, makes the proverbial needle in the haystack child's play—in that case at least you know there is a needle in the haystack. In the past when surface discoveries which might possibly lead to mines were more easily made, mining promotions might possibly have stood the present restrictive measures. As the risks involved in the search increase the possibilities of commensurate rewards must keep pace, instead of working in the other direction as at present. The present trend of legislation is, unfortunately, killing any initiative for mining enterprise.

Governmental legislation, using the term in its broadcast sense, must have two objectives. These are: (1) To ensure a continuing (and taxable) mining industry. (2) to ensure that the operations of the industry, in all its branches, conform to the best interests of the public and the nation as a whole.

In an effort to "protect" the public from mining ventures, governments have enacted regulations governing sale of mining properties, sale of stock, etc., and set up officials to control these with dictatorial powers. It might be pointed out that these regulations are directed entirely at prospects and properties that are not yet proven or that have not yet proven themselves profitable, or in other words, properties that are in need of, and in the market for, funds for prospecting, exploration or development. What the government is apparently trying to do is to take the speculation out of a business which by its very nature is speculative. It is just cannot be done. The search for, and exploration of, mining properties can never be anything else but a win or lose gamble. Anyone placing funds for such work is gambling, whether that term is used or not, and the use of that term does not detract in any way from the legitimacy and national need for such endeavor. In most cases the public appreciates the speculative nature of the exploration for mines, and all they ask for is that the operations and the venture shall be honestly conducted and that the chances of a reward commensurate with the risks shall be left reasonably large. If speculative initiative in a country is killed off the mining industry at least in that country might just as well throw in the sponge.

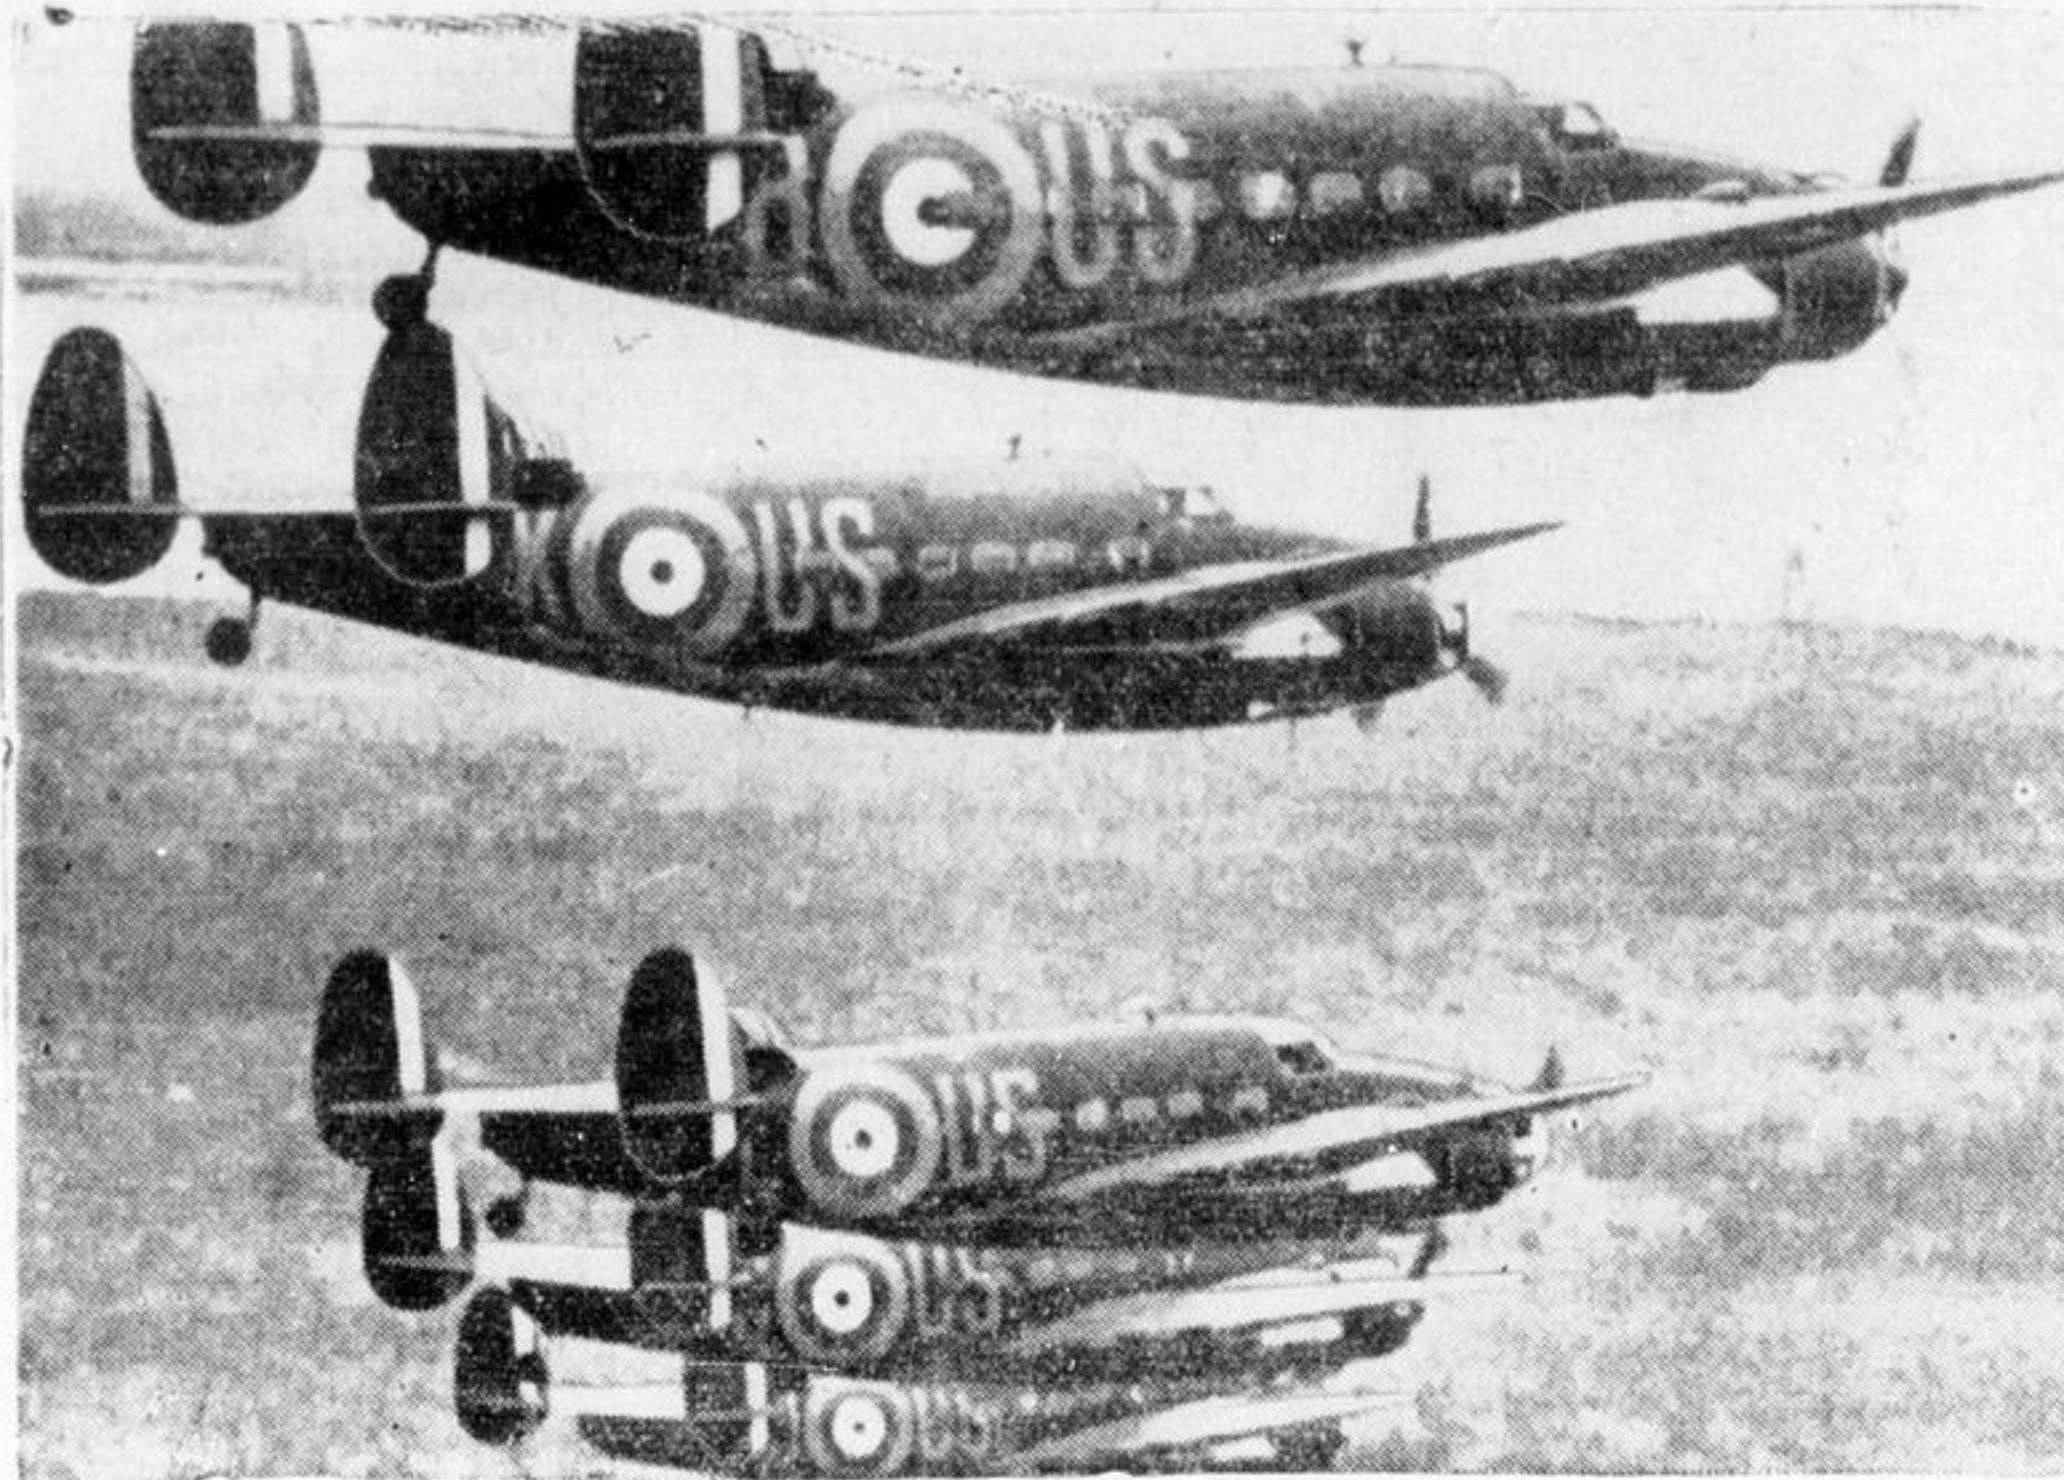

Securities regulations as at present in force do not provide the answer. They certainly do not protect the public, definitely hamstring the prospector and, although to some extent they do protect the broker or promoter (in a place where such protection is harmful) the disadvantages outweigh the advantages. For example, we may consider the regulations regarding the pooling of vendor stock. Under present methods wherein the claim-staker or prospector derives little or no cash from a sale, the sale of a part of the stock received for his property forms the only way in which he may be immediately rewarded for past time and effort. This is prevented by forced pooling of vendor stock. This stock being out of the way, the promoter or broker may and does both set or maintain, or try to maintain, an artificial price on the stock covered by his option, which price often bears no relation to property worth, until such times as he can rid himself of the stock. In most cases the prospector never realizes anything from his share of the stock. In other cases, this vendor stock, by cutting of vendor equity in the property, is cut down to only a fraction of its original amount, with still nothing realized by the holder in the way of cash.

A plain statement of fact is that in the ordinary course of events, a stock will seek its own level, which bears a direct relation to the prospectus value of the property concerned. Temporary unwarranted fluctuations will take place but the public understands this and need make no recriminations if they suffer thereby, unless the fluctuations were by fraudulent statements, rather than natural optimism. Free vendor stock would certainly act as a damper on unwarranted fluctuations and if they did occur would speed a return to warranted valuations.

It would certainly appear that, even to retain both the words "honest" and "speculative" in any consideration, the securities regulations are totally unnecessary and restrictive. The public realizes and appreciates or should appreciate, the speculative aspect. Civil and criminal statutes already on the law books, if properly enforced could give adequate protection against dishonesty and malpractice. However, there was admittedly room for improvement in relations between the public and those interested in mining. Two interlocking points suggest a line of improvements might take. One of these is the education where necessary, of the public as to what mining means and involves. The other is to give the speculation minded public the opportunity to make inquiries into the status of engineers, geologists, prospectors, promoters, directors, and such of any individual property. A governmental bureau for the registration of such information is all that is necessary. Engineers, geologists, and such filing reports with such a bureau should submit for filing at the same time a record of their experience, education, place of business, etc. The public could then assure itself as to the principles and principals involved in any promotion, and this is all the protection they ask for or require. Although honest and sincere principals do not ensure a successful outcome to a mining venture, at least they ensure honest statements and practice. This is as far as anyone can be protected in a speculative business such as mining.

Alleged 'Witnesses' Are Remanded at Tuesday Court.

Two Alleged Car Thieves Are Also Remanded. Woman Sentenced to Three Months on Charge of Selling.

Seven charges laid under the Defence of Canada Regulations were remanded at Tuesday's police court. Six of the charges were laid quite some time ago, and the other was laid on Monday night. A pile of the literature was on exhibit in police court on Tuesday afternoon and there were more than a thousand of the pamphlets in the pile. The accused were released on bail of $500 cash or $1,000 property.

Another of the important cases that was remanded was that of two young boys charged with stealing a Ford Coupe belonging to Miss Mary McMahon. They were brought back to Timmins from Barrie and their cases will appear on the docket next Tuesday.

Nine persons were charged with illegal parking and paid fines of $1 and costs. One man facing the same charge had his case remanded for a week. Another man paid a dollar and costs for failing to have lights on his car.

Four men paid fines of ten dollars and costs on charges of careless driving and another had the same charge against him remanded.

For not carrying an operator's license two men paid fines of ten and costs. Another two men paid ten and costs for having cars with defective brakes.

For not remaining at the scene of an accident Noel Leblanc was fined twenty-five dollars and had his license suspended for three months.

Three persons were fined five and costs on charges of disorderly conduct.

Five more people paid fines of ten and costs or the alternative of thirty days for being drunk.

Two persons were fined ten and costs for having wine in other than their private residences.

Elli Clermont had a charge of assault against him withdrawn with costs when the complainant said that he felt sorry and wanted to withdraw the charge. Alex Susner and John Jackson had minor charges of assault against them dismissed when it was found that they were family squabbles.

Margaret Stringer and John Clarke both of 350 Birch street north faced joint charges of keeping liquor for sale and/or permitting drunkenness. When asked how they wanted to plead, their attorney said that the girl wanted to plead guilty and the man not guilty. Magistrate Atkinson accepted their pleas and handed out a three-month term to Margaret Stringer on the charge of keeping for sale, and dismissed the charges against them of permitting drunkenness.

ernment of the province of Quebec will without further ado proceed to scrap all legislation in the way of securities regulations. It is to be hoped, however, that this consideration will be given to achieve the same purpose with less restrictive means. It must be appreciated also that similar regulations in other provinces, and which are beyond your control, have a direct bearing on the effects of such regulations on the mining in this province. However, if Quebec were to lead the way, I have no doubt others would follow.

Doctors Astounded as Baby Continues to Live

Cincinnati, May 14.—A baby boy, born three and a half months prematurely at a Cincinnati hospital continues to amaze doctors by his stubborn fight for life.

Doctors believe the case is unique in medical records. The baby—too small and delicate at birth to be weighed—is being kept alive in an incubator with the aid of a whiskey stimulant. The first time he was weighed he tipped the scales at just one pound and seven ounces. He's now one month old.

Police Arrest an Alleged "Witness" on Monday Night

Police Claim to Have Caught Him in the Act of Distributing Pamphlets.

Adelard Prevost, 20A Southern Avenue, was arrested by Timmins police just before midnight on Monday night and charged with being a member of an illegal organization. It is alleged by police that he is a member of the religious sect known as "Jehovah's Witnesses."

Prevost, who is 38 years old and is a painter, is said to have been caught in the act of distributing some of the illegal pamphlets in the southern part of the town. The pamphlets were alleged to have been put out by the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society, an organization that was outlawed at the beginning of the war in Canada.

The charge was laid under section 39C2 of the Defence of Canada Regulations and when the man appeared in court on Tuesday his case was remanded pending instructions from the Attorney-General's department.

Elli Clermont, 57 Windsor Avenue, had a charge of assault, causing actual bodily harm, laid against him at 8:50 on Tuesday morning. Clermont, who is a storekeeper, is alleged to have attacked Armand Joseph of 41 Commercial Avenue.

The charge was laid under section

39C2 of the Defence of Canada Regulations and when the man appeared in court on Tuesday his case was remanded to the St. Charles hotel with a friend and while he was there another man whom he knew came in.

The three of them sat there drinking beer till the man that he had come in with had to leave. Shortly after that he had stayed there till 12 o'clock. After that they returned to Timmins and had visited two bootleggers before they went home. He had let the man out of his car at the corner of Second Avenue and Pine Street and as it was was raining he had let the man have his raincoat.

The next morning the man had called at his home and woke him up. Just before he had come into the house he had left Stady's raincoat in the car.

Stady claimed that he had noticed that his raincoat was in the car but didn't know that there was anything wrapped up in it.

He had then driven this friend up town and had left him at his rooming house to phone and had proceeded to a restaurant to get some dinner. It was just after he had come out of the restaurant that he had been stopped by the police. He was of the opinion that the man whom he had brought up town and had loaned his raincoat to must have planted the gold in his car.

Stady also said that when the police started to search the car they didn't search anywhere but on the back seat.

They picked the coat up right away,

he said. He also denied that he had said anything about a big fellow to the police. He said that the police had asked him who the big fellow was

and that when he got into court he should plead guilty because he would get sent down anyway.

Paul Emile Thiboutot said that he had seen Stady and the other man standing beside the car on the corner of Second avenue and Pine street the night before and that the other man was putting a raincoat on.

Alex Larsen said that he was going

Dismissal on Charge of Illegal Possession of High-Grade Ore Tuesday

Man Accused of Possession of High-Grade Valued at $136 Gets Dismissal. Police Acted on Tip and Found Gold Wrapped in Raincoat Behind Seat in Car. High-Grade Confiscated.

When the crown failed to prove that Albert Stady had driven his car around Timmins on the afternoon of May 4th with the knowledge that he had a quantity of high-grade ore wrapped up in his raincoat that was thrown over the back seat, Magistrate Atkinson dismissed the charges against Stady. About halfway through the hearing the court was adjourned so that the magistrate and the attorneys could find out if the constables were obliged to make public the source of their information.

Constable Bert Braney and Constable W. L. Thompson both gave evidence about stopping the car and finding the high-grade ore wrapped up in the raincoat. Constable Thompson was the first witness for the crown and he told of stopping the car after Constable Braney had called for him at his home.

He told of Constable Braney searching the front part of the car and that while that was going on he searched the back part. Behind the front seat he had found the raincoat with a new crucible wrapped up in it and in the pocket of the coat he found a quantity of high-grade ore wrapped up in a hankiechief. Constable Braney had then placed the man under arrest and brought him to the Timmins Police station. When they arrived at the police station Constable Braney had called for him at his home and he had nothing to say.

When they had started to search the car, Constable Thompson said, the accused had asked them if it was a frame-up. After they got to the police station the man wanted to bring thirty dollars that he had in his pockets to his wife and the police had gone to his home with him. On the way back from his home he had asked the police men why they didn't get after the big fellows. He then asked if it would help him if he told them who one of the big fellows was.

"If this is true," Mr. Lawley continued, "the local committees of the National Institute of the Blind have an even greater responsibility to face. It is unlikely there is a more sincere group of workers anywhere than those who find the time to assist the blind," said Mr. Lawley in mentioning that not a single cent of the money entrusted to committees throughout the province had gone astray or been spent in anything but the most conscientious manner.

In introducing Mr. A. B. Howe of North Bay, field secretary for the North, Mr. Lawley paid high tribute to both Mr. Howe and his daughter, Olive. Miss Howe acts as secretary to her father.
