Prisoner Sent to the Nearest Military Centre

In The Advance last week it was noted that Joseph O. Pelletier was fined $25.00 for failure to notify the National Selective Service of change of address as required by the Mobilization regulations. He was also fined $50.00 and costs for alterations on his registration card. He paid the fines last week but this week he was back again in court with two more charges against him. The first charge was that he had failed to submit himself for medical examination as required by the Mobilization Act, although duly notified to do so. When the magistrate read the charge in its formal phraseology, and asked the accused if he understood, Pelletier replied promptly that he did. "Well, you're smart," commented the magistrate, proceeding to explain in less involved words what the charge was against the accused. He still understood, he said, and pleaded guilty. Corp. Langille, of the R.C.M.P., explained that despite all notifications Pelletier seemed determined to evade answering the call to submit himself for medical examination as required by law. The magistrate sentenced the accused to six days in jail, the sentence to start at the time of his arrest last week. After the six days were served, the magistrate ordered, the accused was to be taken under escort to the nearest military centre for medical examination. The magistrate explained to Pelletier that if the military wanted him and he passed the tests he would be right there for them, while if he was not wanted for medical or other reasons they could turn him out and he would be free to go. Pelletier was accordingly taken down to North Bay yesterday, under escort. The second charge against him was withdrawn.
