"INCIDENT"

P. M. S., South Porcupine

"Men's evil deeds we 'grave in brass, Their virtues we write in water,

One lies dying.

Down in the dark of the mine-Men like moles grubbing in muck-A sound as of shifting rock, - Panic - and silence, and some one moaning. Buried beneath ten feet of "loose" In a place where neither spade nor pick Can be handled safely,

Who volunteers to go in there Who will risk life and limb Who will brave death to save that piteous soul, Whom all hear moaning?

Without a thought of self, nor moment's hesitation, A man steps out. Goes down into the pit With but one thought . . . to help a brother. His brother; though born on alien soil; Whose forebears fought each other madly A Finn in pity goes down to aid a Russian

In slow and tortuous descent Fearful of falling rock Holding his breath lest shivering pile Should tumble and engulf him. He lifts with skilful bleeding hands each stone And lessens rock by rock the murderous heap Works with feverish haste, with awful care Is wet with fearsome sweat. Thankful for each safe moment Fearful of the next.

At last he frees the victim, sees he breathes. Says to him "Just a little longer, friehd"-And slowly up the victim is conveyed. And reaches surface. Sees again the sun, His poor chest crushed from weight of falling rock One deep breath draws-his last-and he is dead

Bosses and miners gather round and talk Of how the "loose" had fallen

The Finn is there; his duty done; His conscience clear. He feels no need of medal or of praise. With bruised and swollen hands,-with beating heart, With knowledge that with "blood and sweat and tears" He has saluted Death.

He goes unhonoured and unsung Bearing the weight and glory of his hurts Down in the depths again to work his shift.
