A WEEKLY MEDITATION

Many generations of preachers and theologians have pointed out the difference between the religion of authority and tradition, and the religion of the spirit. At its best, Protestant Christianity reflects the religion of the spirit.

In this kind of religion human need is more important than ecclesiastical tradition, acts of helpfulness are more important than theological ideas, opportunities for the growth and enrichment of life are more important than the maintenance of the status quo, personal and spontaneous prayer is more important than the repetition of devotional forms from which the vital essence of religion has been drained.

Protestant Christianity makes the attempt to worship God in spirit and in truth. It brushes aside the encrustments of centuries to get at human need and to win people to the experience of Christian living.

That is the kind of religion we need. That is the kind of religion we want to promote.
