

LAFF A LITTLE

Mrs. Callahan condoled with Mrs. O'Toole after the demise of the latter's husband. "And what did he be dying of?" asked Mrs. Callahan.

"Gangrene," sighed Mrs. O'Toole.

"Well", said Mrs. Callahan, "thank God anyhow for the color of it."

It's hard to tell these days whether you're walking behind a man who needs a haircut or a woman who just got one.

The Temperance League held a big convention in the same Southern Hotel where the national insurance salesmen were gathered for a powwow. The salesmen planned to top off a big dinner with "Spiked Watermelon" for dessert, but the waiters got a little mixed up and served it to the League by mistake. The hotel manager was frantic when he heard of the mix-up. "That watermelon is soaked in alcohol," he moaned. "Get it away from those teetotalers before they run me out of town."

The waiters returned to say it was too late. The Leaguers were busy chewing away at the prized watermelon. "What did they say?" asked the nervous hotel manager. "How do they like it?"

"I don't know how they like it, boss," said the headwaiter, "but they're all putting the seeds in their pockets."

A man took his very talented dog into a producer's office and put it through an hour long routine of quoting Shakespeare and singing difficult operatic arias with perfect pitch.

"Pretty good!" said the producer, after it was all over. "Let's see her legs."

"Oh, what a funny looking cow," the chic young thing from the city told the farmer. "But why hasn't it any horns?"

"There are many reasons," the farmer replied, "why a cow does not have horns. Some do not have them until late in life. Others are dehorned, while still other breeds are not supposed to have horns. This cow does not have horns because it is a horse."
