LIBRARY REVIEW -

"The Lady" - Conrad Richter

The author tells a story of New Mexico a hundred years ago. Dona Ellen, the Lady, is a great beauty, born to wealth and position. She draws all who know her, with one exception into the silken web of her aristocratic charm. But inevitably she clashes with Snell Beasley, a man of money, forceful, coldly ambitious and a master of legal intrigue. Because of this evil man her brother, husband and son are murdered. With no protectors left to defend the position she regards as hers by inalienable right, there is still a means of rescue, of terrible and wonderful triumph for "The Lady."

Here was not a memorial to young men and women of Terrace Bay who answered their country's call in the two great wars.

There was no Terrace Bay until 1946. When the Second World War was being waged, there was not a single human being living in the area of forest land which is now the site of one of the most up-to-date towns in Canada.

Terrace Bay residents have been recruited from every province in the Dominion. So it is that in building their Cenotaph they have made it a national monument, commemorating the sacrifice of brothers and sons, or relatives and friends who donned their uniforms in towns and cities scattered from coast to coast.

This notwithstanding, it was a community spirit which spurred the people of Terrace Bay to the erection of a Cenotaph. Last Remembrance Day when war veterans gathered as usual to reminisce and to remember the dead in two minutes of silence, the question arose: why not a Cenotaph? Typical of the aggressiveness of residents, the answer came swiftly. Business firms, students, the service club, lodges, the unions, the Improvement District, the Kimberly-Clark Company and others furnished the money and a committee headed by E. A. Marostica went into action.

That community spirit was reflected in the faces of the crowd that circled the Cenotaph on the spacious lawn beside the Recreation Centre. From the Boy Scouts and Girl Guides lined up in their uniforms, to the veterans wearing the berets of the Legion to the men
