more complex building sets may in turn be supplied with additional accessories such as gears and motors.

A prism, magnet or magnifying glass may introduce the six or seven year old to the fascinating world of science. A reasonably priced, good quality microscope may foster a life-long interest in botany or biology. For the sedentary child, perhaps a piece of outdoor play equipment will help him balance his playtime, while for the active child, an intriguing game may help him learn to sit and concentrate.

Toys can be found in everyday objects. For little housekeepers, what could be more appealing than the small real pots, pans, beaters and cookie cutters to be found in any hardware store? And for the junior carpenter, a real tack hammer, large headed nails and a bag of softwood scraps from the lumberyard make a real hit. The stationery and variety store also should be considered for the wealth of items such as flashlights, order pads, ticket rolls, paper punches, padlocks, stickers, pipecleaners, scissors and glue - all of which can encourage imaginative and creative play.

It makes sense for a consumer to look closely at purchases in the toy field. A little thought about toys and play can save the consumer time and money and your child, disappointment and frustration.

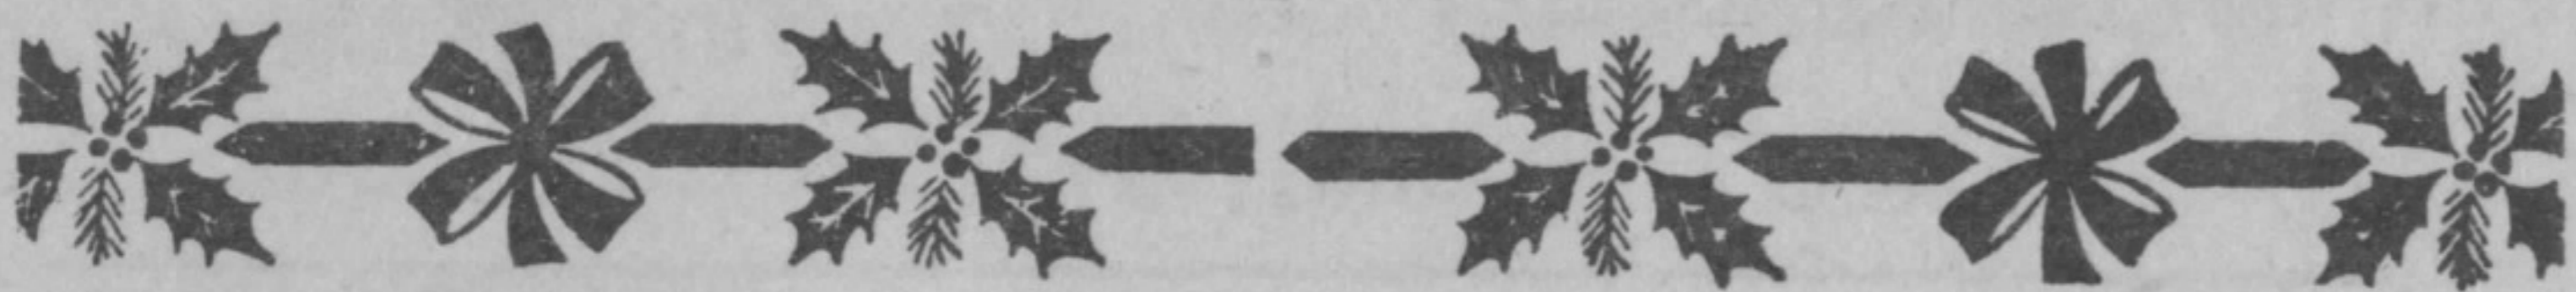

A toy buying guide appears in the current edition of Canadian consumer, the Association's bi-monthly magazine. To subscribe, write Consumers' Association of Canada, 100 Gloucester St., Ottawa 4.
