GARDEN DIRT

With falling leaves comes tulip planting time. Tulips prefer sandy to medium loamy soil but will thrive in almost any soil for shorter periods providing there is good under drainage.

The bulbs should be set from 6 to 10" deep, it should be remembered that they will require good earth for a few inches below that again. Deeper planting prevents, to some degree, the tendency of the bulbs to split into numerous small bulbs which will have either no bloom or poor blooms.

Another advantage of deeper planting is that other flowers can be planted over them. By the time that the tulip blooms are fading the other plants will be getting big enough to hide the withering foliage.

Tulip foliage should not be removed until it is completely ripened, otherwise the bulb will be starved. The bulb needs the leaves to provide the nourishment which will make possible the production of large healthy blooms next year.

If annuals are grown over the tulip bed it is best to cut them off at ground level during fall clean-up - pulling them up will remove some of the tulip cover. If the dead plant is left until spring the tulips will grow up through the tangled mess making it difficult to remove without damaging the new growth.
