ONTARIO HYDRO "ON STRIKE"

Local 1000 struck five of Ontario Hydro's Thermal Generating Stations early last week. About 950 employees* were withdrawn from the Hearn and Lakeview Stations in Toronto, the J. Clark Keith Station in Windsor, the Lambton Station near Sarnia and the giant Pickering Nuclear Plant east of Toronto.

Together, these five stations represent about half the generating capacity of the Ontario Hydro network.

Hydro's transmission and distribution systems were so far unaffected by direct strike action, although supervisory personnel worked long hours last week to restore service after storms associated with Hurricane Agnes swept the Province.

"Management staff has been handling the majority of off-hours trouble calls," said Jack Hamer, Area Manager for Ontario Hydro. "In cases of clearly defined emergencies we have called on Union members through their stewards to help restore service to customers."

The 12,000 member Local 1000, Canadian Union of Public Employees has been in a legal strike position since June 21st. The Union has withdrawn overtime and on-call duty as part of its strike action and has picketed work locations across the Province.

There has been no progress at the bargaining table since the Ministry of Labour temporarily suspended talks on the eve of the strike.

Mr. Hamer said that the last contract agreement between the two parties had increased Hydro's annual operating costs by $17,372,000.
