

What Caught My Eye - cont'd

No matter how rich you are, who's to say that your children, or your grandchildren will continue to pay that $1,000-plus fee each year to keep you chilled?

Even if you set up a trust fund towards keeping you frozen, you can bet your gum rubber boots your next-of-kins will go to court to snatch that money away. After all, you're dead, you can't use the money, and they can.

Let's face it, that would interfere with the family fortune, and the kids wouldn't go for it.

Experts predict that maybe, just maybe, by the year 2500, there's a good chance that many of today's unsolved, fatal diseases will be curable.

That means that people frozen in this century will have to pay away their dreamless sleep for 500 years.

Remember that right now about 70 million people die each year in the world. If that figure stays the same until the year 2500, then 25 billion of us will have 'bit the dust'.

Okay, so if we were all millionaires and I/1000th of us decide that we wanted immortality, that would mean, there would be 35,000,000 of those nitrogen cylinders stored somewhere by the year 2500.

Say the doctors of that time have found ways to cure us of our diseases. The question is, will they? Even if they do, when will it be your turn? After all, 35 million bodies isn't exactly a piece of pie.

Further, why should anyone from the year 2500 be interested in reviving us folks from the 20th century? What would we know?

Imagine reviving 35 million people from the 20th century to the 25th century, finding them houses and jobs, etc. Would it be worth giving them (us) job-training and teaching us to live in a 25th century society?

Whatever would the people of such a world want with frozen meat? They'd have a carefully controlled population level, etc.

The last thing they'd want would be to bring back 35 million people from past ages, increase their population and undertake the task of retraining. (Think about it!).
