ONTARIO TO BUILD EXPERIMENTAL WASTE RECLAMATION PLANT

An experimental waste reclamation plant will be constructed as the initial stage in developing a solid waste resource centre, Environment Minister James Auld announced. "We are now seeking qualifications from engineering consultants to design a plant that will recover resources from municipal solid waste", the minister stated.

The objectives of the reclamation plant would include the investigation of alternative procedures, processes, and equipment for separation and reclamation; the study of additional processing required for marketing of reclaimed materials; the assessment of methods of reducing transportation costs for separated materials, and ways of reliably estimating capital and operating costs of various types of reclamation plants.

The experimental facility will also give industry and other agencies the opportunity of installing and testing equipment and processes related to waste management fields. The development of a comparison scale of various waste handling methods with regard to their environmental effects, including the consumption of energy, will also be assessed.

"The basic feature of this facility will be flexibility", said Mr. Auld. "It must be flexible enough to accommodate all the different experiments that the Ministry's Waste Management Branch plans to conduct; plus new ones that are certain to materialize as plant procedures develop."

"It should also be emphasized, that despite the experimental label we are giving this plant it is intended that it will be a working unit with the capability of recovering substantial quantities of reusable raw material from the incoming waste", Mr. Auld emphasized.

TODAY'S CHILD

BY HELEN ALLEN

THE TORONTO SUN SYNDICATE

Gregory looks like a self-assured young man but the pose is deceiving. He is an insecure, immature youngster, more like going-on-seven than his real age of nine.

You don't need to be told Gregory is handsome, with brown eyes, dark hair and tanned skin highlighted by a few freckles across his nose. His background is Hungarian. He is in good health.

Outgoing Greg has a warm, friendly, affectionate nature and a great desire to please. He has pleasant manners and is punctual and co-operative. Adults and other children treat him like a nine-year-old and are surprised when his behavior belies his age.

Greg's school work is in keeping with his immaturity. He is attending special education classes for children whose academic abilities are below the average.

On his own, and not in comparison with other children, Greg is a delightful boy. He has an impish smile, loves little jokes and seems to have a basic rapport with nature. He is interested in everything living and growing so he finds the whole outdoors a wonderland.

The Children's Aid Society feels Greg could learn to succeed at home and at school when settled in a secure, understanding home. He needs loving parents and two or three older brothers and sisters.

To inquire about adopting Gregory, please write to Today's Child, Box 888, Station K, Toronto. For general adoption information, please contact your local Children's Aid Society.
