is not required to meet the National Ambient Air Quality Standard for nitrogen oxides. Nitrogen dioxide results largely from chemical changes that take place after nitrogen oxides are emitted into the air.

The Environmental Protection Agency released air quality data indicating that nitrogen dioxide (NO₂) does not represent a widespread air pollution problem now, but that a National Ambient Air Quality Standard is still needed to protect the public health.

Based on this data, the EPA suggested that the mandatory 90 percent reduction in auto emissions of nitrogen oxides by 1976, as required by the Clean Air Act,

The new data was derived from measurements made during 1972 at some 200 sites across the nation. They indicated that only two air quality control regions - Los Angeles and Chicago - definitely have nitrogen dioxide levels exceeding the health-related standards. Originally 47 air quality control regions were in this category.

The EPA said it anticipates proposing about March 1974 the formal selection of a new "reference method" for measuring nitrogen dioxide.
