Montreal is always a top newsmaker -- whether it be another Stanley Cup championship for the Canadiens, a political assassination or, like last week, the announcement that the International Olympic Committee had turned thumbs down on the idea to have the swimming contestants in the '76 Olympics compete in the nude.

Someone in Montreal, obviously an Olympic PR man, had pointed out that records showed that swimmers without trunks or suits had shaved up to two seconds off standing records. It was a nice try, but it didn't work!

Yes, Montreal is and always will be a great newsmaking town.

Last week, for instance, Montreal Canadiens netminder exceptionelle Ken Dryden shocked the hockey world (especially us Canadiens fans) by leaving his $80,000 a year job with the Habs for a $135. a week post that will make him a rookie lawyer in Toronto for a year.

But it's not always bad news and no good news in Montreal. For every piece of bad news, there's usually some good.

That good news, of course, is the way those Amazing Expos have been sticking it out to the bitter end for that one and only playoff spot in the National League's east division.

The Expos swept a three-game series from Philadelphia Phillies on the weekend to pull within half a game of the leading Pittsburgh Pirates. Then they took on St. Louis Cardinals the third place team, in another three-game set. Expos lost two out of three to the tough Cards, but not before they had run up a six-game winning streak.

When the Expos lost 5-3 to the Cards last Monday night in the second game of a double-header, that's when their winning streak ended. But they gave their hometown fans more than their money's worth. Expos had won the opener 5-4, and they didn't give up the second until the 12th inning.

Last Tuesday night, the Expos lost again (7-4) to the Cards, but as fate would have it, so did the first place Pirates. So, with only a couple of weeks remaining in the schedule, the magnificent Expos were still only one game behind the Pirates.

Not bad for a team that was rated a 50-1 underdog to take the NL title!

Starting last Wednesday, the Expos were playing a three-game series against Chicago Cubs in the Windy City. Then it was back home to Montreal for probably their most important
