Ozone Damage

The stratosphere is the layer of air from 10 to 30 miles above the earth where the ozone is located. The ozone, earth's protective layer, is continuously formed by the action of sunlight on oxygen molecules. Until lately, the ozone has been destroyed—at the same rate it was being formed—by other sun-triggered reactions involving natural nitrogen compounds that are formed in the stratosphere. Now, though, human activities are on the threshold of upsetting that balance by adding more ozone-destroying chemicals in nearly the amount of the natural rate.

Take the family for a weekend holiday at Thunder Bay's indoor summer resort.

There are about 100 million bicycles in the world today. Last year, 10 million more were sold on the streets and highways.

Even one is a bicycle.

We urge you to be familiar with the rules of the road for bicycle safety. Obey the traffic laws. Keep in mind that a bicycle is a vehicle. Remember the Highway Traffic Act: a bicycle — you are a bicyclist to drive.

That's why you should be familiar with the rules of the road and Commuter's Guide. They're called the Highway Traffic Act.
