Pluton....

at several locations on the Canadian Shield in Ontario, but the Lac du Bonnet batholith will give them a first-hand look at a pluton's "insides".

Whiteshell researchers want to study the rock to see if it has cracks and where they occur, to learn how water travels underground through the rock, to discover how rock properties are affected by drilling and mining activities and to test the rock's strength and other characteristics.

The underground research laboratory will be like a small mine, operated as a research laboratory for almost 15 years. Construction is scheduled to begin next year and in preparation, a 600-metre access road to the site of the mine shaft is now being built.

Scientists will conduct a wide range of tests and experiments during and after construction to assess how that particular type of rock would respond under conditions created by disposal of nuclear wastes. Wastes will not be buried or stored in the underground lab and when experiments have ended, the lab will be sealed, the site restored and the land returned to the province in the year 2000.
