Paper, which most of us take for granted has a fascinating history. Making paper is an art that began more than 1,000 years ago. It was in 105 A.D. that a Chinese priest, Tsai-Lun, used the first real paper, made from linen fibres, to inscribe ancient prayers.

Prior to that the Egyptians had used the unrolled stem of the papyrus reed, which grows abundantly by the Nile. And even before that the Greeks used either earthenware tablets, palm leaves, the bark of trees or even thin sheets of lead to record important events.

The art of paper-making was brought to the Western world by the Arabs. Long caravans crossed the Middle East and North Africa carrying with them the culture of the ancient world. This was brought to Europe as much by the Moors in Spain as by the Crusaders.

The recipe for making paper was taken to France by three men who had escaped from Arab prisons.

It was during the 11th century that rag-paper was first produced. A gradual process of technical improvements led to rag-paper finally replacing both papyrus and parchment (produced from animal skins) as a writing medium. By the 17th century, paper was available in various qualities, suitable for a range of uses.

Wallpaper today, with its purely decorative use, had very different beginnings. Its origins stem from the Middle Ages when popular icons, called "dominos," representing the Almighty and the saints, were stuck into the walls of lower-class dwellings in Western Europe.

There they performed a double-function, serving as both a talisman against bad luck and a covering for the cracks and crevices in the wall itself.

The first reference to flocked wallpaper comes from a technical description dated 1470 and found in the Monastery of St. Catherine in Nuremberg, Germany.

Of course we are all familiar with Victorian wallpapers featuring roses and cupids, often considered the golden age of wallpaper.

Today we have every conceivable type, from metallic to bamboo, scenes from mountain lakes to cool forests. Wallpaper is an ancient art which has come a long way from its humble beginnings!

Summer caps are so easy and quick to crochet you will no doubt want to make more than one. The instructions for this cap are on leaflet no. 7552.
