Remembrances of Schreiber centennial

Often great disappointments beget great achievements. Picking the right tone of voice, the proper gut responses to events, is an art in which I, personally, am sadly lacking. It is my intention to inspire others to respond to the recent Schreiber centennial celebrations and share their thoughts, revelations and experiences so that we may all catch the spirit of that magic week.

And magic it was. It was as though had stopped briefly and had given us all a second chance to relive our lives, rejuvenate old and forgotten feelings and experience countless cases of deja vu.

Renewing old acquaintances and listening to stories long forgotten were constant reminders that you may leave Schreiber but that Schreiber never leaves you. It was difficult, at times, to separate the past from the present. Even the infirmities of old age seemed to abate and with each passing day a feeling of togetherness pervaded and everyone sensed that this was truly an unforgettable, joyous, momentous occasion, never to be experienced again. One does not come away from long days and nights remembering the past and considering the present, full of sorrow. In the end, quite the other way, one is renewed.

After any occasion of this nature there is always a letdown, a sadness in the realization that the magic moment has passed and many of us have failed to grasp the full significance.

failed to express our true feelings, failed to convey a message to all Schreiberites that the event touched our daily lives deeply.

We live in a cynical, selfish, unsentimental world. A world in which, to show one's emotions is viewed as a weakness.

I happen to think otherwise. I happen to think Schreiber is different, has always been different and, assuredly, will always remain different.

The magic moment need not pass. If enough of us respond with our stories, experiences, however insignificant, it will keep the spirit of Centennial '85

Royal Commission report on Northern Environment

The long awaited report of the Royal Commission on the Northern Environment was released in Thunder Bay on last Thursday.

The report was commissioned by Premier William Davis' government in 1977 to inquire into all matters pertaining to the environment north of the 50th parallel. The Liberal government has asked that the report be released to the public at the earliest possible date.

A land mass larger in area than Western Europe, yet containing less than half of one per cent of Ontario's population, the region north of 50 degrees extends from an imaginary line running north of the Trans Canada Highway in Northern Ontario to the shores of James and Hudson's Bays and is bounded by the provinces of Quebec and Manitoba.

Justice Patrick Hart was appointed to head the commission. He published an interim report in 1978 and was succeeded as commissioner that year by Ed Fahlgren, a Northern Ontario mining executive.

The commission interviewed hundreds of people in communities and reserves across Northern Ontario, accumulating a wealth of information.

The 450 page report and its recommendations touch on every aspect of life in the remote north, including native concerns, resource management, the environment and government's role in the region's future development. Northern Affairs and Mines Minister

Rene Fontaine said his ministry is heading an interministerial committee to study the report's recommendations.

"Because the recommendations have major implications for a number of ministries, Premier Peterson has asked my ministry to co-ordinate the government's response," he said. He noted that some of the proposals contained in the recommendations have already been targeted for attention from the Liberal government.
