20 years of research to develop a system to reduce spread of rabies

After 20 years of research and field testing, Ontario has developed a system to reduce the spread of rabies outbreaks in rural wildlife populations- and the first full-fledged control program will be launched next year in eastern Ontario.

Work on the system began in 1965 when Ministry of Natural Resources and Connaught Laboratories researchers started developing a vaccine and a method to distribute vaccine in a bait over a specific rural area.

Wildlife, especially skunks and foxes- the main rabies carriers in Ontario- that ate the baits, would not be infected by existing rabies carriers, thus lessening the chance the disease would spread into neighbouring areas.

Since then, Connaught has developed a vaccine and MNR has worked out the aerial distribution of baits from low-flying aircraft.

This fall, the ministry will determine in field tests whether or not the bait should be in a plastic bag when dropped.

Researchers are still analyzing rabies data to pinpoint the best location for next year's bait drops within the boundaries of the Ottawa-Carleton Region and counties of Leeds and Grenville.

Rabies has been a problem since the 1950s when the disease appeared in southern Ontario. In 1986, a record 4,212 Ontarians were treated for exposure to rabid animals.

Scarborough skunks get the point

How do you vaccinate a skunk? "First, you live trap them, then cover the cage with plastic sheeting," according to Dr. Rick Rosatte of the Ministry of Natural Resources' rabies research unit.

"Then you push a smaller live-trap cage into the first cage, gently squeezing the skunk down to the end.

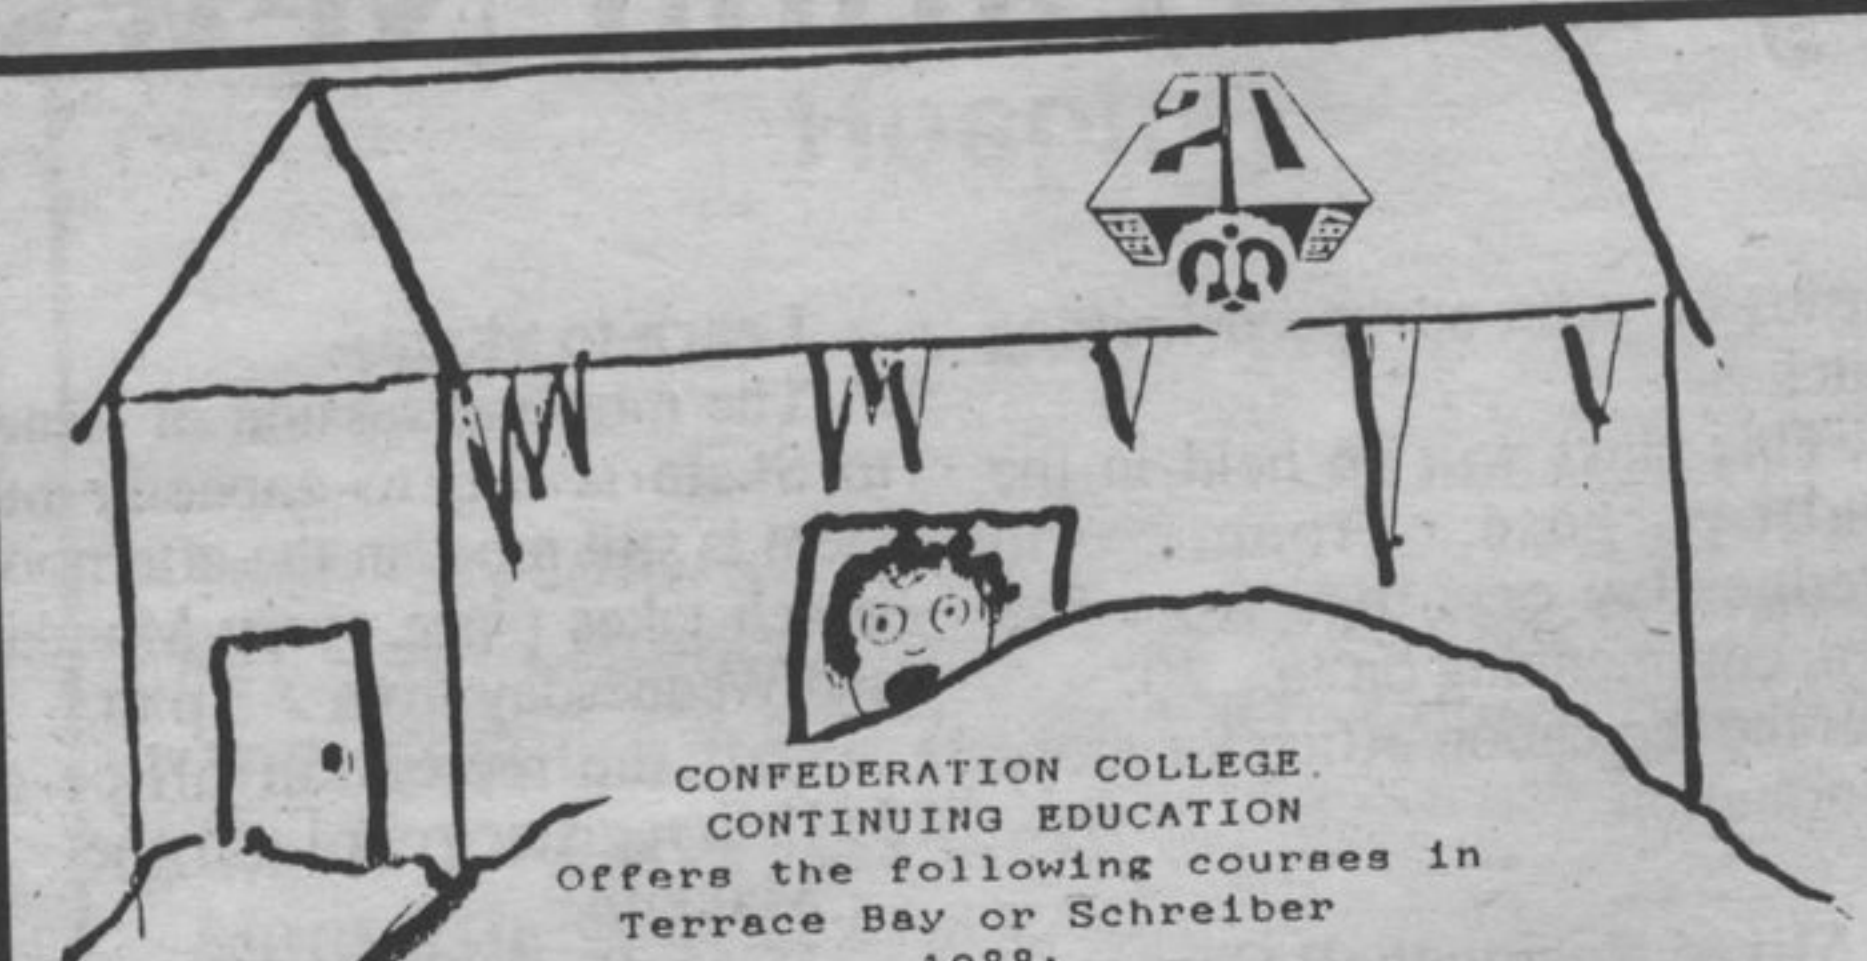

"Remove the plastic sheeting, and simply vaccinate the skunk with a hand-held syringe.

"Apparently skunks in a confined area don't have enough room to flex muscles that control their spraying equipment."

That's what MNR researchers have been doing in a trap-and-release program to vaccinate skunks and raccoons against rabies in a 60-kilometre square
