Enterprising Canadians

By Ann M. Smith
Just in case there was ever any doubt, there's more evidence that the entrepreneurial spirit in Canada is alive and well. And that, say the experts, is good news.

The most recent proof comes from Statistics Canada showing that between 1975 and 1986 the number of self-employed workers in this country rose an impressive 54 per cent—more than double the rate recorded for paid workers. The report also concludes that by 1986, 1.6 million workers (in other words, one out of seven working Canadians) were working for themselves.

It isn't difficult to see why these figures are so popular. In short, the Statistics Canada numbers suggest that, for the most part, Canadians are adapting quite nicely to the changing nature of our economy: in other words, as large corporations are forced to "downsize" (that polite buzzword for "layoffs") their operations, displaced workers are able to arm themselves with the necessary tools to go out and start their own businesses.

John Bulloch, president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, says he isn't at all surprised by the results.

"The overwhelming evidence in this country points to
