

Other programs are following the Crime Stoppers approach

Neighborhood Watch is another way communities are fighting crime. By keeping an eye open to unusual activity in certain areas, citizens are ensuring the safety of their neighborhoods.

The Block Parent program is another way of making a neighborhood safer. It provides a haven for children to go to if they ever feel threatened or unsafe.

Television too is getting involved in the act of solving crimes. Unsolved Mysteries, an American television program using a style similar to Crime Stoppers, is responsible for the capture of a number of highly dangerous criminals - found in both the U.S. and Canada.

The show is geared to the U.S. market, and, accordingly, increases the drama, action, and intensity of the crime presented, although the facts themselves are unchanged.

Producers of the show say this is done in order to compete with other television programs for a larger share of the viewing public.

Another program which tries to involve the public in solving crimes is the placing of pictures of missing children on milk boxes.

As society becomes more aware, and more repelled by the crime that occurs around them, an increasing number of "crime solving" programs are bound appear. They definitely get results, and, may help to stem the growing amount of crime.
