

Pet talk

By Alice Scott

By Alice Scott

Cats, especially the family pet, usually don't inflict much damage to people with their scratches and bites; but if they are not trained correctly they can be very destructive towards your furnishings.

Declawing is not a suitable solution to scratching problems. It is a painful and difficult operation, equivalent of removing the first joint of all your fingers.

If your cat is declawed he can turn into a biter. I have a cat who is declawed, but only because he was operated on before I adopted him. My first two cats were not declawed, and didn't cause any problems until they were 13 years old. At that time one of them did become senile and started scratching one of our chairs. This was easily solved by putting him, in the family room during the night.

The best way to prevent scratching is to provide a scratching post.

Many pet stores have them available, but it is more economical to build your own.

Use a 4 x 4 post, 2 to 3 feet tall, nail this to a piece of 1/2 inch plywood about 1 foot square. Then wrap the post with a piece of carpeting turned inside out to expose the rough side. Rub a little powdered cat nip into it occasionally to make it irresistible to your cat.

When your cat is a kitten never let it scratch or bite your hands, even in play. If you do, the cat will think it's alright to bite and scratch you and won't understand that he is hurting you.

Trim your cats claws when they become too long. Only trim the sharp tip. If your cat panics when you are doing this, then trim only a few nails at a time. Always give your cat a small treat after nail cutting; this way it will condition him to accept the routine of trimming.
