of Jamie Kennedy of Toronto's Palmerston Restaurant when we ate there last spring. The asparagus was perfection. Kennedy had merely steamed it, then served it to each diner swaddled in white linen napkins. A small bowl of hollandaise sauce was placed in the centre of the table as a dip. We used our fingers and relished every bite.

Peel the bottom of tough, older stalks. Stand them upright in a deep saucepan with 1/2 cup or so of water. Cover and quickly bring the water to a boil. Reduce the heat and steam for 3 - 5 minutes, or until the asparagus is bright green and still a little crisp.

While it is steaming prepare a Hollandaise Sauce in your blender as follows:

- 1/2 cup butter
- 3 egg yolks
- 1 1/2 tbsps fresh lemon juice
- 2 tps water
- 1/4 tsp salt
- 1/4 tsp freshly ground pepper
- 1 tsp Dijon mustard OR 1/2 tsp dry mustard

Melt the butter in a small saucepan until bubbling, but not browned.

Place the egg yolks in the blender or food processor container. Add the lemon juice, water, salt, pepper and mustard. Blend on low speed for 5 - 10 seconds. While the machine is still running, pour in the hot butter in a thin stream. When half of the butter is added, increase the blender speed to high and incorporate the rest.

Serve immediately as a sauce to be poured over the asparagus or as an elegant dip.
Makes 1 cup.

Retired Anglican Archbishop Ted Scott was named as the neutral Chairman. Wally McKay, a former grand chief, was appointed by the Nishnawbe-Aski Nation. A retired doctor and former Zone director of the Sioux Lookout Zone Hospital, Dr. Harry Bain, was appointed by the federal government. The inquiry opened offices in Sioux Lookout and Toronto, and hired staff. Formal hearings opened in Sioux Lookout on September 12th, 1988.

Four of the five original fasters came back to Sioux Lookout to make a presentation to that first public hearing. Josias Fiddler, the spokesman for the group, made headlines with shocking allegations of inhuman health care treatment. The story that shook people up the most went like this: according to Fiddler, a woman neighbor came to his house, asking for help. She said she was going into labor, and wanted assistance to get to the nursing station in Sandy Lake. Fiddler took her to the nursing station, even though it was the middle of the night. According to Fiddler, a nurse examined the woman, then told her to go home, saying "the baby's time has not yet come". Later that night, according to Fiddler, the woman gave birth in her outhouse. It was 25 degrees below zero, and the baby died of exposure. According to Fiddler, he wrapped the body in a blanket, and took it to the nursing station. You could hear a pin drop in the hall where the hearings were being held when he said he told the nurse, "I guess this baby's time has not yet come."

That story rocked the inquiry. Archbishop Scott seemed particularly distressed by the story, and by the headlines it made on the CBC, and on the front page of the Globe and Mail. Two days later, he read a statement to the inquiry, giving a response to Fiddler's allegation from Health and Welfare Canada. According to Ottawa, Fiddler's story was not exactly accurate. According to medical records, the woman in the story never came to the nursing station. She hadn't even told the nursing station she was pregnant. The first indication the nursing station had about the incident was Fiddler showing up with the dead baby.

Nonetheless, Fiddler struck to his version of the story. The public and the media were left wondering who to believe. The questions surrounding that incident seemed to hang over everything else the inquiry heard from then on. Were health care services as bad as the native people were saying? Or were they just exaggerating to make headlines?

The inquiry continued holding hearings, travelling to 22 remote communities in the far north, from the Manitoba border as far north, from the Manitoba border as far north as Hudson Bay. Hearings were also held in Toronto, Thunder Bay, Winnipeg, and Ottawa. Months later, in May 1989, the health panel released its final report. That report, called "From Here to There; Steps Along the Way - Achieving Health for All in the Sioux Lookout Zone" was a major disappointment to the political leadership of the Nishnawbe-Aski Nation. In the year that's gone by since, health care services have not been overhauled, as the Inquiry called for. Instead, the Nishnawbe-Aski Nation has gone back to the drawing board and come up with its own plan to restructure native health care, from the bottom up.
