Northern Insights Our newest government

"develop a mechanism for getting input for all parties that are interested in...developing the Ontario position. In the end an agreement, if it's going to be successful, is going to be an agreement that everybody feels that they've been part of. And although not everybody's going to be at the negotiating table, all perspectives will be addressed."

I hope the non-native interest groups who approach Rosehart seeking input will accept the principle the other two governments have: these are talks between sovereign states, not just another interest group. If they do, the negotiations have a chance of succeeding. If they don't, we run the risk of entering yet another round of racial bitterness and mud-slinging. Perhaps, after the recent summer of Oka and other roadblocks, the non-native groups of northwestern Ontario are willing to accept this new beginning.

Hydro inspection fees will increase

Ontario Hydro's electrical inspection fees will increase on Jan. 1 for the first time in more than two years.

Increases will average 10 per cent, and affect all residential, commercial and industrial installations, said Roger Staig, Hydro's manager of electrical inspection.

Staig said the construction boom and productivity improvements enabled Hydro to avoid increased expenses during the period since October 1988, but costs have risen to the point where an adjustment became necessary.

The new inspection fee for a typical single detached residence will be $86, up from the current $78.

For public safety, the Electrical Safety Code requires inspection of all electrical work.
