people were exercising their aboriginal right to fish and hunt, even when game and fish laws were being broken.

The new leniency policy will not be much different. Wildman said "our enforcement policy will be modified so that we recognize the rights native people have to hunt and fish for food for personal and community use." This amounts to formalizing what was being done informally before, "to minimize the number of instances where native people might be charged."

Wildman quickly added, "I recognize before we go any further [than the leniency policy] it will be important for us to consult widely with the First Nations and with groups such as the OFAH. "He asked the OFAH "to appoint a committee to liaise with me and ministry staff about enforcement approaches, and the government's overall direction in terms of native access to resources."

Rich Morgan said the OFAH welcomed the idea of appointing a committee, but questioned the way the government was negotiating self-government agreements. He particularly questioned the face that the government was starting the self-government negotiations with the remote northern area, represented by the Nishnawbeaske Nation [NAN]. "We have to be careful about setting a precedent in the far north," Morgan said, "that wouldn't be appropriate in the more populated southern areas. We've got to look at the entire province when we're negotiating with a particular group."

Wildman made it clear at the lunch with the media that he's thinking the same way. "We've started work on a province-wide agreement on negotiating principles for aboiginal self-government," he said. "We can't treat one native group in one part of the province differently than any other."

Wildman's message to the OFAH was thus crystal clear - just like it was to a NAN convention in the same Thunder Bay hotel November 28 - this government wants to do things as much as possible in the open, and through consultation. But if won't back down on aboriginal self-government agreements. At the media lunch, Bryan Meadows, the Times-News correspondent from Dryden, asked Wildman "what should I tell my son, when he asks me why he doesn't have the same rights to hunt and fish as an Indian?" Wildman's answer was straight to the point: "Tell him the native people were here first, long before his ancestors, and that gives them special rights."

Straight talk - talk that won't necessarily win votes - but at least it's consistent.

time and understanding.

It's these family 'warts' which seem to get in the way sometimes. In a family setting they become exaggerated and less understood because sometimes too much perfection is sought for and expected. But NONE of us is perfect, or will ever be perfect.

Why can't we understand that and learn to live charitably with each other's imperfections, family or friends? But then, if we really understood, we would all love each other, wouldn't we?

Paper Napkin Holder

By Carolyn Williams

Cut a toilet paper roll about 2 1/2" long. Cut with a knife so it does not crush. Cut a piece of contact paper 1/2" longer than the roll.

Adhere to the roll leaving 1/2" at end. Cut this extra piece or slit at intervals and fold inside. Paint the inside first, the same color as the contact paper.

Use 1/2" braid trim to glue around the top, 1/2" inside and 1/2" outside.

You may also use tissue paper, construction paper or wrapping paper to cover roll. Adhere with glue.
