Great Lakes action plan

The International Joint Commission has identified 17 Areas of Concern in the Canadian portion of the Great Lakes Basin. They are located along the Great Lakes from Thunder Bay at the head of Lake Superior to Cornwall on the St. Lawrence river. In each area, communities have formed Public Advisory Committees (PACs) and have established cleanup goals for their area. The PACs are made up of people from all areas of the community and are in place to advise governments on the Remedial Action Plan for their community.

Environment Canada with $55 million to help develop and demonstrate technologies and remedial programs to meet federal responsibilities in Canadian Areas of Concern. Operating on the principal that "the polluter pays," the Cleanup Fund incorporates a strong element of partnership. Depending on the nature of the project, contributing partners can include federal, provincial or municipal agencies as well as industry and interest groups.

The final $20 million has been allocated to the Department of Health and Welfare for a Human Health Effects Program. The Department of National Health and Welfare is consulting extensively with Great Lakes communities and undertaking studies to get a better handle on the effects of toxic chemicals in the Great Lakes ecosystem on human health. The aim is to identify those populations most at risk and to find ways to protect them from pollution. Researchers will test people for chemical levels over a period of time and check for health problems that might be related to pollution. In particular they will be looking at the health of people who eat greater than average amounts of fish or other foods from the lakes. Researchers are particularly interested in the health of children, who are more vulnerable to many pollutants than adults. People considered to be at risk will be advised on how they can reduce their exposure to pollution.

The Great Lakes Action Plan is one way that the governments at the federal and local levels are working with citizens to achieve a common goal. For more information contact Environment Canada at 1-416-973-8632.
