Aboriginal self-government

Thunder Bay last May, the deputy grand chief of NAN, Jim Morris, spelled out the process in five steps:

1. Creating indian institutions (child care, education, health, policing and so on).
2. Review legislation, to discover areas of conflict between aboriginal values and the laws governing the indian institutions.

3. Amend legislation to allow the indian institutions to operate in conformity with native values and culture.

4. Create federal and provincial legislation to enable self-government.

5. Entrench this legislation in the constitution.

Even Morris has admitted that the process will take "several more years."

It's already taken since 1986 to get as far as NAN'S Step 3. If NAN communities fragment the process further, by each First Nation community asking for its own seat at the table, self-government negotiations will take even longer.

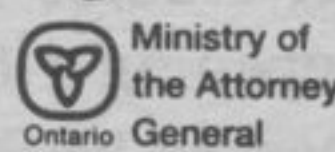

Thus, despite Ovide Mercredi's protests, if the federal government carries out its Proposals on self-government as it says it will, then the Proposals might just be acceptable, at least to aboriginal leaders in northern Ontario.

PUKASKWA NATIONAL PARK OPEN HOUSE

The public is invited to attend an informal open house to discuss the proposed revisions to the Pukaskwa National Park Management Plan. The open house will be held in Marathon at the Zero-100 Motel on Wednesday, November 20, 1-5 p.m. and 7-9 p.m.

A newsletter summarizing the proposed revisions to the Management Plan can be obtained by calling the Park office at (807) 229-0801.

Your comments on the proposed revisions to the Management Plan will help us plan the future of Pukaskwa.
