employees to follow a double standard when pursuing violations "committed by large companies, compared to violations committed by individuals or small contractors."

Moe Courchesne, a timber technician in Gogama in northeastern Ontario, is quoted in the brief saying this double standard is "common practice."

"All these small jobbers that aren't on an FMA (Forest Management Agreement), they'll get nailed right away for doing something wrong. FMAs are not. They're so protected, you wouldn't believe it. You just won't believe it. Somebody that has not signed an FMA, the Ministry controls them a lot more. They do not control an FMA hardly at all. All we do is we make sure they're complying (with) the terms of the annual plan, where they are cutting, not how they are cutting it. Like if they're leaving high stumps, it's just going to be recorded."

When asked whether his superiors had given him any explanation for the double standard, Courchesne says he was told:

"The Crown Timber Act fines are not high enough. The argument all the time
