 not just their present right to appoint some members of police and housing commissions? Which level of government would have the final say on environmental matters, or welfare administration?

Should school boards have complete control over curriculum matters, or should provinces retain the authority to set standards? Those questions (not to mention dozens of others) are very complex and would require a much more comprehensive agreement on division of powers than what the artisans of the Charlotte-town Consensus were able to achieve.

I suggest that a good place to start is at the local level, to convene constituent assemblies with a mandate to draw up a "municipal constitution" that makes sense for each community. Aboriginal self-government will require local bands to go through that kind of a process, once aboriginal continued on page 10
