

Katie Notwell sang "Let the Sunshine In" for the crowd.

United Church Observer commented that the Community Church was located in "an affluent society. The basic wage rate recently rose to $2.60 an hour."

Today, Rev. Beth McLean holds the position that Rev. Lavender first held. She says there wasn't enough time last year to organize a 40th anniversary celebration, but, she jokes, she's looking forward to the church's 46th anniversary party.

Kay Graham, Elizabeth Harris and Shirley Mikus put together the displays for the anniversary.

They included photographs from services in the old dining hall, a photo album detailing milestone's in the church's history, and a display of clothing worn when the church in Terrace Bay began.

Charlotte, the pig's new name, is a slender 15 pounds right now and eats regular pig mash. Phil says he expects she'll weigh about 80 pounds by the time she's an adult.

"Their sense of smell is just as good as a bloodhound," he says. "They're using one in the United States to sniff out dope."

In early 1951, a fundraising campaign raised $11,000 for building a church, mostly through payroll deductions. In May of that year, the church's Board approved an architect's design for the building.

The church was completed in an amazingly quick five months, and the first mass was held on Dec. 9, 1951. Rev. Arthur Lavender officiated that first mass, and remained with the Community Church until his retirement in 1959.

In the early 1960s, a vestibule was added to the original structure, and later that decade, the church—and the community—caught the attention of a church magazine.
