Sornberger, Myrtle, and his little daughter, who were the victims of a railway crossing accident at the Myrtle station. The accident took place last winter after a big storm. Plaintiff was driving his little daughter to school at Myrtle, but in crossing the C. P. R. track got stuck in the snow. He got out and spent some time in trying to get his rig out of the way, when suddenly a train came along and pitched Sornberger's rig off the track, smashing him and the little girl hadly. Sornberger had a leg broken in several places, and had his body and face disfigured badly. The little girl also shows number of scars. The great question to be settled was whether or not the approaching train had whistled and rung its bell as much as it should have done. Ten or twelve witnesses were heard on each side, some of whom had come to the spot from neighboring houses to see the snowplow clear the track. The railroad trainmen and section men took the ground that the whistle had been blown and the bell had been animals by the most approved method. Also rung according to regulation.
