Mabel's Doll.

FOR THE CHRONICLE.

Along her wandering way she sped, A figure bore which looked full fair, With parted lips of richest red. And streaming strands of shining hair, And eyes which seemed to tireless gaze Deep into eyes of mightier powers. — Her doll,—the toy of youth's first days. And life's young morning's opening hours.

I thought that doll so deftly formed To play its fated breathless part Whose mortal frame was never warmed With fires whose foel fed the heart, Whose dead days felt no right nor wrong, Was poemless though great years should roll, But yet I knew all things have song,

Its worst deed cannot evil be.

No spirit e'er 'hall mourn?" Ah, yea, A little life will grieve alone When wise hands cast the toy away. And she has older, lovelier grown. And when the journeying joys it gives Fail with the years, she'll rightly sigh, Tis only that which for one lives Can ever for one truly die.

Then should she dearly love her doll With eyes that gleam through ghostly gloom, Which ne'er the troubled tear let fall, With lips as voiceless as the tomb Which hold all secrets spoken soft By love into the lifeless ear. But not alone in vain; for oft
