So spoke, with a doleful shake of his grey beard, Pierre Giraud, as he sat at his cottage door-his usua post, just then, thanks to the rheumatism which racked his poor old joints so cruelly, and looked out upon the small, green meadow, which, with the old horse that was grazing upon it, formed his entire possessions.

"What! Part with our old horse, father? Oh. don't do that! The field would look quite strange without him, and I'm sure I wouldn't have any appetite for breakfast if I didn't see him come up to the door for his bit of bread.

"Well, I shall miss him sorely myself; but what's to be done? The rent's due on Saturday, and I can't possibly make it up without selling old Blaize. Everything seems to have gone ill with us, somehow, since your poor mother died, but we must take what fortune sends. There's a fair at the town to-morrow, so you'd better take Blaize there and see what you can get for him."

Next morning, accordingly, away went Charles, with a very rueful face -riding for the last time upon his old friend, who seemed to know that there was something wrong, and, instead of going along at his usual brisk amble, hung his head and moved as slowly and solemnly as if he were drawing a hearse.

Charles himself was not much happier. The thought of losing his favorite, who used to eat out of his hand and follow him about like a dog, quite took away the pleasure of the bright sunshing and the green fields and the fresh flowers, which he would have enjoyed very much at any other time. And, by the time he got to the town, he felt so low that he hardly cared to eat the bread and cheese which his careful father had put in his pocket.

However, the stir and bustle of the fair, with its long lines of tents and waving flags, and jingling bells and painted booths, heaped with toys and cakes, and gayly-dressed acrobats and jugglers, brightened him up a little and he was glad to find that old Blaize fetched a good price, and to see that the man who bought him seemed to be a good-natured fellow.

"My name's Blaize, too," said he, as he took the bridle from Charles care of my namesake. I live on the Croix-Rouge farm, not far from here, and if you ever want him back again you'll know where to find him."

And now came the paying of the satisfaction.

Charles found a very unhandy thing his own service. to carry.

"You will have a poor chance, my lad, on a lonely road at nightfall, with that bag of money clinking in your hands," said the keeper of a little inn at the corner of the market place, who knew him well. "Better remain here for the night than be robbed on the way home. I'll give you a night's lodging and welcome."

But Charles thought of his father. sitting waiting for him alone, and so he "declined, with thanks." and tramped manfully out of the town, bag and all.

But he found walking much slower work than riding, especially with such a weight to carry, and, hasten as he might, darkness overtook him when he was still a good way from home.

And now the innkeeper's warning began to come back to him unpleasantly enough, as well it might, for in those days the roads of France were not by any means as safe as they are now, and the great war which had just ended had flooded all the highways with armed ruffians, who had followed the trade of plundering too long while fighting was going on to think of giving it up now, and who, provided they could get hold of a heavy purse, cared little whether it was taken from a countryman or foreigner.

Just at this point the road dipped down into a dark narrow gully, overhung on one side by thick, huge bushes, while on the other, a broad, rapid stream went dashing and foaming among the huge, black bowlders.

Charles looked around with a start. The word "thief" seemed to have acted like a spell; for, right in front of loomed through the twilight a tall man on a gaunt, sinewy brown horse. The slouched hat half concealed his face, but what little could be seen of it hardly needed the thick beard and the huge black patch over one eye to make him as ugly a ruffian as our hero ever saw. Poor Charles hardly knew what to do. His first thought was to hit the horse on the nose with his stick, and either upset the robber or give him work enough to keep him busy, while he himself got out of reach; but the highwayman's hand was upon one of the pistols in his holsters, and he saw that that would not do. There was nothing for it but to try and gain ton, N.B., is a daughter of Mr. Ezra Millar, a wealthy and influential farmer, and the young lady is a general favorite among a wide circle of acquaintances, who have had occasion to congratulate her upon her complete restoration to S health, after a severe and trying illness When a correspondent of the Gleaner -called upon her, and requested that the facts might be given for publication, the T young lady, though not at all anxious for publicity, nevertheless gave her consent in the hope that her experience might prove beneficial to some of the many young girls whose condition of health is | very similar to what her's was previous to her cure. Miss Millar stated that when her illness began her mother was unable to look after the affairs of the household and the duties largely de la volved upon her. She felt berself grow ing weak and easily tired, but felt that she must keep up. She says: "Notwith standing my efforts I found myself growing worse and worse. My appetite failed, my complexion became sallow and my eyes sunken in my head. I was troubled with dizziness, shortness of breath and palpitation of the beart until at times I felt as though I would suffocate. I was almost constantly troubled with a pain in the side, and sexere headaches. When I went up stairs I was obliged to rest. Life had become almost a burden and at last I was forced to give up and keep my bed. My friends feared I was going into consumption and one remedy after another was tried with no beneficial results until I was induced to give Dr. Williams' Pink Pills a trial. In less than three weeks I was able to leave my bed and go about the house, and the use of the Pink Pills a few weeks longer completely restored my health and strength and drove away all symptoms and pains which had made my life so miserable.
