On that particular morning I was in decidedly sentimental mood, because the day before I had heard a young and charming woman accompanying herself among the stones, then fling it to the at the piano and singing the tenderest of romances in which during the last note the butterflies of the song linger at the heart of the roses.

And the garden in which I was walking was quite of a character to foster this gentle frame of mind. It was not wild or overgrown.

Its flower beds were blue, red and yellow balsams, were ranged with as much precision as the Sevres cups and Saxony statuettes on a whatnot of a provincial housewife; the sand of its paths, where the rake had left markings as distinct, straight and exact as the lines in a bar of music, and its cor rect and uniform borders, stiff as the frills of a dress that had not been crushed, seemed to suggest the ambition of a very pleasant ideal-an ideal in perfect taste, without violence or exaggeration; narrow, elegant, pretty and quite suited to furnish water color and delight, would they settle on its ed Goods. "Frivolous lover of roses and lilies," I began, "whence comes this delicate powder you scatter from your wings as you fly from flower to flower, can you tell me? I am sure you must have suggested the arts of the toilet to the perfumer, for yours are the only wings that scatter whiteness like a puff."

The butterfly said, "Tis strange." But as he had nothing to do he condescended to enlighten me. I am sure we should learn many things that are not in books and not known by learned men if we chatted more frequently with the insects of the woods and fields
