A table is attached to the mower, covered with a false bottom raised a few inches made of strips to allow shelled seed and chaff to fall through to the bottom below, while the bundles are being raked off by hand. When the space below the slats is filled up the chaff and seed are removed into bags. The seed obtained from this chaff will be found to be of the finest quality. After the crop is cut it should be allowed to lie until thoroughly dried. If it should get get wet with rain, do not attempt to turn the bundles as the heads will fall off the stalks and the seed will be lost. The wagon rack used for hauling to the barn should be closely covered with boards or strong canvass. The bundles should be picked up carefully with barleyforks and placed on the wagon. Do not attempt to use a horse-rake to put it in winrows or the bulk of the seed will be shelled off and left in the field.

If two or more qualities of seed are grown such as may result from winter killing which allows weeds to grow up in such places, it will be found advisable to harvest the crop in such a way that different qualities can be threshed separately. The reason for this will be obvious as the best seed will be easily cleaned if the foregoing conditions have been attended to, but where it has been winter filled, foxtail and other weeds are likely to grow up amongst the clover. Selfcatches on the land that has been in seed the year previous may give a good crop, but as a rule self-seeding should be avoided as white clover is pretty sure to get into the land and destroy future crops of alsike. As soon as the first crop has been harvested, the land should be plowed, as it does not produce much aftermath. To keep it for a second crop of seed the following year usually results in a failure.

COMMON RED CLOVER.

Common red, or broad-leafed clover is a native of Europe. It is supposed to have been introduced into England from the Netherlands about the time of Queen Elizabeth, but it was not until the close of the last century that it found its way into Scotland and became generally cultivated in Britain as a forage crop. The plant is perennial, but in this country is generally treated as a biennial. Owing to the severe frosts the plants usually die at the end of the second year. Up to about fifteen years ago there was but little trouble experienced by the farmers of this province in cutting the first crop for hay and obtaining a good crop of seed from the second cutting, but unfortunately this cannot now be done owing to the introduction of the clover Alsike clover is regarded as a cross seed midge, which was discovered in between the red and white or Dutch the state of New York in the year 1877 clover.
