> fronting the Canadian steel industry, and other industries 8-1* mainly serving the domestic market, is how to meeet all competitive pressures arising from the comparative smallness of that market, plus those resulting from our commitment to the North American standard of living. No Canadian, least of all the Canadian manufacturer, wishes our wage-level to fall to that of Asia or Europe. Yet Canadian steel and other producers are expected to compete in their relatively small domestic market not only against goods manufactured in Asia and Europe, but also against those mass-produced in the United States. The skill with which Canadian industry has met this unique situation is a measure of the competence of Canadian management. But no amount of managerial skill would have ficed to keep our economy eynamic had Canada not found herself in an unusually favorable economic situation at the end of World War II."
