

RIGHT HO... king their autumn selections... most Fashionable and Cheapest...
Ocean at Victoria. Walking... serviceable qualities and the...
instances cheaper than the...
the Gloves, Hosiery, Ribbons...
Dresses, Damasks, Ribbons...
Floor Oil Cloth, Crumb Cloth... such low prices as must ensure... where he succeeded in purchasing... and genuine cheapness. The... locked with the latest styles and... the shipping, and you will be... in Skirts and Quilts, and... and lolly. King street east, close to

Travellers' Guide.
NORTHERN & NORTH-WESTERN
COAST ROUTE.
MILTON, ONT. 1855 P. M.
CREDIT VALLEY RAILWAY.
MILTON, ONT. 7:31 A. M. S. P.
MILTON, ONT. 7:31 A. M. S. P.
MILTON, ONT. 7:31 A. M. S. P.

Canadian Champion

VOLUME 25.
A YOUNG GIRL'S WOOING.

BY E. P. ROE.
Author of "The Noble Savage," "From Jest to Earnest," &c., &c.

CHAPTER XIX.
AN OVERTURE TO THE MARRIAGE.

Miss Willmore's indignation was as scathed on the following morning, when, as she returned from a drive with Maggie, Graydon galloped up on a fresh bay horse, and, as if by magic,
the kind of man to speak to on
about his affairs unless it is essential,
but if anything were ails he would have told me. I know the times are dim and dark, and a better offer in my
assured salary than in the firm now.
No one but 'beats' are making any thing."

"I hope your brother isn't in a hurry,
like papa," she said, warmly.
"He's quick commercial instinct took alarm, and he asked, 'What have you heard anything?'"

"Oh, no indeed, Papa says that Mr.
Muir is a man to do the most honest
vative of me; but he also says that there is scarcely a chance now for any honest man, and that investment which once seemed so solid, these mountains
are sinking out of sight like a mirage.
No one should be so worried. He wouldn't like it if he knew I was talking to you in this way; but then I know it will go on, and I can't help it."

"I have, but you cannot think that I
like it or approve of the diplomacy you
are conducting. It is a pity, even though
your motive be the best, that you
don't think you ought to be placed in
such a position, and would that it were
in my power to relieve you from it!"

"I telegraphed early this morning for
equipment; and they should be here
this afternoon."

"That was considered kindness itself. You
must let me pay for all this. You
know I can't."

"But here's reason in all things." "That's
therefore, a little in my mind. Please,
Maggie, don't make me feel that I am
stranger to you. I am not a stranger to you, and I shall be glad to see you
often. I have found the horse out more
than this for candy, flowers, and
senses. I have yielded everything,
haven't I? and, as I have yielded, I wish
to let a little of my fault to you."

"Well, then," she said, laughing and
blushing, "as from you of the family—"
"And from your deceased brother,"
he interrupted.

"She put her finger to her lips. 'That's
past,' she said. 'No more allusions.
We been sensibly last night, and I certainly am very comfortable in my
gifts that I should present against even
from Henry. I wish to prove to you that I am the Magdalen of old times as far as I can go.'"

"I had understood, and they were
going slowly towards the stable,
"Maggie," cried the young man, "I
going with no better protection than a rainside? I'm always a little of when a horse like that is at hand. I am glad you have such a horse, and I will be glad to see you often. I have found the horse out more than this
for candy, flowers, and senses. I have yielded everything, haven't I? and, as I have yielded, I wish to let a little of
my fault to you."

"I have, but you cannot think that I
like it or approve of the diplomacy you
are conducting. It is a pity, even though
your motive be the best, that you
don't think you ought to be placed in
such a position, and would that it were
in my power to relieve you from it!"

"What do you mean by saying 'ill times are better?' she asked in gentle solitude. 'Are you having a hard time in town, the poor papa?'"

"Oh, bless you, no. Don't suppose Henry is making much. He's a kind of man to take in sail in times like these. I'm not in the firm yet, you know, and he's not speaking to me about the business in the least. I left it to him and safe. Of course, I don't know much about Mr. Muir's side of the water yet. Mr. Muir is not the kind of man to speak to on
about his affairs unless it is essential,
but if anything were ails he would
have told me. I know the times are
dim and dark, and a better offer in my
assured salary than in the firm now.
No one but 'beats' are making any
thing."

"I hope your brother isn't in a hurry,
like papa," she said, warmly.
"He's quick commercial instinct took
alarm, and he asked, 'What have you
heard anything?'"

"Oh, no indeed, Papa says that Mr.
Muir is a man to do the most honest
vative of me; but he also says that there is scarcely a chance now for any
honest man, and that investment which
once seemed so solid, these mountains
are sinking out of sight like a mirage.
No one should be so worried. He wouldn't
like it if he knew I was talking to you
in this way; but then I know it will
go on, and I can't help it."

"I have, but you cannot think that I
like it or approve of the diplomacy you
are conducting. It is a pity, even though
your motive be the best, that you
don't think you ought to be placed in
such a position, and would that it were
in my power to relieve you from it!"

"I telegraphed early this morning for
equipment; and they should be here
this afternoon."

"That was considered kindness itself. You
must let me pay for all this. You
know I can't."

"But here's reason in all things." "That's
therefore, a little in my mind. Please,
Maggie, don't make me feel that I am
stranger to you. I am not a stranger to
you, and I shall be glad to see you
often. I have found the horse out more
than this for candy, flowers, and
senses. I have yielded everything,
haven't I? and, as I have yielded, I wish
to let a little of my fault to you."

"Well, then," she said, laughing and
blushing, "as from you of the family—"
"And from your deceased brother,"
he interrupted.

"She put her finger to her lips. 'That's
past,' she said. 'No more allusions.
We been sensibly last night, and I
certainly am very comfortable in my
gifts that I should present against even
from Henry. I wish to prove to you
that I am the Magdalen of old times as far
as I can go.'"

"I had understood, and they were
going slowly towards the stable,
"Maggie," cried the young man, "I
going with no better protection than a
rainside? I'm always a little of when
a horse like that is at hand. I am glad you have such a horse, and I
will be glad to see you often. I have
found the horse out more than this
for candy, flowers, and senses. I have
yielded everything, haven't I? and, as I
have yielded, I wish to let a little of
my fault to you."

"I have, but you cannot think that I
like it or approve of the diplomacy you
are conducting. It is a pity, even though
your motive be the best, that you
don't think you ought to be placed in
such a position, and would that it were
in my power to relieve you from it!"

He learned more fully what he had discussed before, that she would have been his hand fully managing the horse, and he gave him a run that covered
him with foam, and tested his breathing apparatus. He galloped back to the stable, and found that the horse had strapped around his waist, and his strength were not sufficient to make this animal approach the engine. Shouting
to the baggage man to bring the extra articles to the stable, he then turned and made another experiment. A hostler brought him a blanket, which he strapped around his waist, and mounted again in a lady's style. It was at once riden by a woman. He was not plunged around frightfully, and Graydon had to clutch the mane often to keep his seat. He made his horse joined him, and looked with a
interest, at times laughing, and again implored Graydon to dismount. This he refused to do, and, pouring from his face. Resigning the reins, he
and, wearing horse to a stable-boy,
came toward the young girl, mopping his brow and exclaiming, "What a do at all. He is as shy as a cat. No woman should ride him, not even a squire."

"I have, but you cannot think that I
like it or approve of the diplomacy you
are conducting. It is a pity, even though
your motive be the best, that you
don't think you ought to be placed in
such a position, and would that it were
in my power to relieve you from it!"

"I telegraphed early this morning for
equipment; and they should be here
this afternoon."

"That was considered kindness itself. You
must let me pay for all this. You
know I can't."

"But here's reason in all things." "That's
therefore, a little in my mind. Please,
Maggie, don't make me feel that I am
stranger to you. I am not a stranger to
you, and I shall be glad to see you
often. I have found the horse out more
than this for candy, flowers, and
senses. I have yielded everything,
haven't I? and, as I have yielded, I wish
to let a little of my fault to you."

"Well, then," she said, laughing and
blushing, "as from you of the family—"
"And from your deceased brother,"
he interrupted.

"She put her finger to her lips. 'That's
past,' she said. 'No more allusions.
We been sensibly last night, and I
certainly am very comfortable in my
gifts that I should present against even
from Henry. I wish to prove to you
that I am the Magdalen of old times as far
as I can go.'"

"I had understood, and they were
going slowly towards the stable,
"Maggie," cried the young man, "I
going with no better protection than a
rainside? I'm always a little of when
a horse like that is at hand. I am glad you have such a horse, and I
will be glad to see you often. I have
found the horse out more than this
for candy, flowers, and senses. I have
yielded everything, haven't I? and, as I
have yielded, I wish to let a little of
my fault to you."

"I have, but you cannot think that I
like it or approve of the diplomacy you
are conducting. It is a pity, even though
your motive be the best, that you
don't think you ought to be placed in
such a position, and would that it were
in my power to relieve you from it!"

"I telegraphed early this morning for
equipment; and they should be here
this afternoon."

"That was considered kindness itself. You
must let me pay for all this. You
know I can't."

"But here's reason in all things." "That's
therefore, a little in my mind. Please,
Maggie, don't make me feel that I am
stranger to you. I am not a stranger to
you, and I shall be glad to see you
often. I have found the horse out more
than this for candy, flowers, and
senses. I have yielded everything,
haven't I? and, as I have yielded, I wish
to let a little of my fault to you."

Whenever emergency occurred, he might do all that was possible. The young girl herself was a presence not soon to be forgotten. Her eyes were slightly parted, her lips slightly parted, and her whole
power, and her face, visible to the powerful motions of the horse, grace fully. She passed on down the main street, and then she turned, waved her hand, and, with a smile, and with her companion galloped away to the stable. Several of Mr. Muir's acquaintances came forward, offering congratulations,
and then they were seen to enter the
stable, in spite of her words to the contrary. He kept her eyes fastened upon Maggie, as she was in sight.
"Well," she said, "I have not ever seen anything equal to this!"

"I have, but you cannot think that I
like it or approve of the diplomacy you
are conducting. It is a pity, even though
your motive be the best, that you
don't think you ought to be placed in
such a position, and would that it were
in my power to relieve you from it!"

"I telegraphed early this morning for
equipment; and they should be here
this afternoon."

"That was considered kindness itself. You
must let me pay for all this. You
know I can't."

"But here's reason in all things." "That's
therefore, a little in my mind. Please,
Maggie, don't make me feel that I am
stranger to you. I am not a stranger to
you, and I shall be glad to see you
often. I have found the horse out more
than this for candy, flowers, and
senses. I have yielded everything,
haven't I? and, as I have yielded, I wish
to let a little of my fault to you."

"Well, then," she said, laughing and
blushing, "as from you of the family—"
"And from your deceased brother,"
he interrupted.

"She put her finger to her lips. 'That's
past,' she said. 'No more allusions.
We been sensibly last night, and I
certainly am very comfortable in my
gifts that I should present against even
from Henry. I wish to prove to you
that I am the Magdalen of old times as far
as I can go.'"

"I had understood, and they were
going slowly towards the stable,
"Maggie," cried the young man, "I
going with no better protection than a
rainside? I'm always a little of when
a horse like that is at hand. I am
glad you have such a horse, and I
will be glad to see you often. I have
found the horse out more than this
for candy, flowers, and senses. I have
yielded everything, haven't I? and, as I
have yielded, I wish to let a little of
my fault to you."

"I have, but you cannot think that I
like it or approve of the diplomacy you
are conducting. It is a pity, even though
your motive be the best, that you
don't think you ought to be placed in
such a position, and would that it were
in my power to relieve you from it!"

"I telegraphed early this morning for
equipment; and they should be here
this afternoon."

"That was considered kindness itself. You
must let me pay for all this. You
know I can't."

"But here's reason in all things." "That's
therefore, a little in my mind. Please,
Maggie, don't make me feel that I am
stranger to you. I am not a stranger to
you, and I shall be glad to see you
often. I have found the horse out more
than this for candy, flowers, and
senses. I have yielded everything,
haven't I? and, as I have yielded, I wish
to let a little of my fault to you."

He learned more fully what he had
discussed before, that she would have
been his hand fully managing the horse,
and he gave him a run that covered
him with foam, and tested his breathing apparatus. He galloped back to the
stable, and found that the horse had
strapped around his waist, and his
strength were not sufficient to make this
animal approach the engine. Shouting
to the baggage man to bring the extra
articles to the stable, he then turned
and made another experiment. A
hostler brought him a blanket, which he
strapped around his waist, and mounted
again in a lady's style. It was at once riden by a woman. He was not
plunged around frightfully, and Graydon had to clutch the mane often
to keep his seat. He made his horse
joined him, and looked with a
interest, at times laughing, and again
implored Graydon to dismount. This
he refused to do, and, pouring
from his face. Resigning the reins, he
and, wearing horse to a stable-boy,
came toward the young girl, mopping
his brow and exclaiming, "What a
do at all. He is as shy as a cat. No woman should ride him, not even a
squire."

"I have, but you cannot think that I
like it or approve of the diplomacy you
are conducting. It is a pity, even though
your motive be the best, that you
don't think you ought to be placed in
such a position, and would that it were
in my power to relieve you from it!"

"I telegraphed early this morning for
equipment; and they should be here
this afternoon."

"That was considered kindness itself. You
must let me pay for all this. You
know I can't."

"But here's reason in all things." "That's
therefore, a little in my mind. Please,
Maggie, don't make me feel that I am
stranger to you. I am not a stranger to
you, and I shall be glad to see you
often. I have found the horse out more
than this for candy, flowers, and
senses. I have yielded everything,
haven't I? and, as I have yielded, I wish
to let a little of my fault to you."

"Well, then," she said, laughing and
blushing, "as from you of the family—"
"And from your deceased brother,"
he interrupted.

"She put her finger to her lips. 'That's
past,' she said. 'No more allusions.
We been sensibly last night, and I
certainly am very comfortable in my
gifts that I should present against even
from Henry. I wish to prove to you
that I am the Magdalen of old times as far
as I can go.'"

"I had understood, and they were
going slowly towards the stable,
"Maggie," cried the young man, "I
going with no better protection than a
rainside? I'm always a little of when
a horse like that is at hand. I am glad you have such a horse, and I
will be glad to see you often. I have
found the horse out more than this
for candy, flowers, and senses. I have
yielded everything, haven't I? and, as I
have yielded, I wish to let a little of
my fault to you."

"I have, but you cannot think that I
like it or approve of the diplomacy you
are conducting. It is a pity, even though
your motive be the best, that you
don't think you ought to be placed in
such a position, and would that it were
in my power to relieve you from it!"

"I telegraphed early this morning for
equipment; and they should be here
this afternoon."

"That was considered kindness itself. You
must let me pay for all this. You
know I can't."

"But here's reason in all things." "That's
therefore, a little in my mind. Please,
Maggie, don't make me feel that I am
stranger to you. I am not a stranger to
you, and I shall be glad to see you
often. I have found the horse out more
than this for candy, flowers, and
senses. I have yielded everything,
haven't I? and, as I have yielded, I wish
to let a little of my fault to you."

Whenever emergency occurred, he might
do all that was possible. The young girl herself was a presence not soon to be forgotten. Her eyes were slightly parted,
her lips slightly parted, and her whole
power, and her face, visible to the
powerful motions of the horse, grace
fully. She passed on down the main street, and then she turned, waved her
hand, and, with a smile, and with
her companion galloped away to the
stable. Several of Mr. Muir's acquaintances
came forward, offering congratulations,
and then they were seen to enter the
stable, in spite of her words to the contrary. He kept her eyes fastened upon Maggie, as she was in sight.
"Well," she said, "I have not ever
seen anything equal to this!"

"I have, but you cannot think that I
like it or approve of the diplomacy you
are conducting. It is a pity, even though
your motive be the best, that you
don't think you ought to be placed in
such a position, and would that it were
in my power to relieve you from it!"

"I telegraphed early this morning for
equipment; and they should be here
this afternoon."

"That was considered kindness itself. You
must let me pay for all this. You
know I can't."

"But here's reason in all things." "That's
therefore, a little in my mind. Please,
Maggie, don't make me feel that I am
stranger to you. I am not a stranger to
you, and I shall be glad to see you
often. I have found the horse out more
than this for candy, flowers, and
senses. I have yielded everything,
haven't I? and, as I have yielded, I wish
to let a little of my fault to you."

"Well, then," she said, laughing and
blushing, "as from you of the family—"
"And from your deceased brother,"
he interrupted.

"She put her finger to her lips. 'That's
past,' she said. 'No more allusions.
We been sensibly last night, and I
certainly am very comfortable in my
gifts that I should present against even
from Henry. I wish to prove to you
that I am the Magdalen of old times as far
as I can go.'"

"I had understood, and they were
going slowly towards the stable,
"Maggie," cried the young man, "I
going with no better protection than a
rainside? I'm always a little of when
a horse like that is at hand. I am glad you have such a horse, and I
will be glad to see you often. I have
found the horse out more than this
for candy, flowers, and senses. I have
yielded everything, haven't I? and, as I
have yielded, I wish to let a little of
my fault to you."

"I have, but you cannot think that I
like it or approve of the diplomacy you
are conducting. It is a pity, even though
your motive be the best, that you
don't think you ought to be placed in
such a position, and would that it were
in my power to relieve you from it!"

"I telegraphed early this morning for
equipment; and they should be here
this afternoon."

"That was considered kindness itself. You
must let me pay for all this. You
know I can't."

"But here's reason in all things." "That's
therefore, a little in my mind. Please,
Maggie, don't make me feel that I am
stranger to you. I am not a stranger to
you, and I shall be glad to see you
often. I have found the horse out more
than this for candy, flowers, and
senses. I have yielded everything,
haven't I? and, as I have yielded, I wish
to let a little of my fault to you."

Whenever emergency occurred, he might
do all that was possible. The young girl herself was a presence not soon to be forgotten. Her eyes were slightly parted,
her lips slightly parted, and her whole
power, and her face, visible to the
powerful motions of the horse, grace
fully. She passed on down the main street, and then she turned, waved her
hand, and, with a smile, and with
her companion galloped away to the
stable. Several of Mr. Muir's acquaintances
came forward, offering congratulations,
and then they were seen to enter the
stable, in spite of her words to the contrary. He kept her eyes fastened upon Maggie, as she was in sight.
"Well," she said, "I have not ever
seen anything equal to this!"

"I have, but you cannot think that I
like it or approve of the diplomacy you
are conducting. It is a pity, even though
your motive be the best, that you
don't think you ought to be placed in
such a position, and would that it were
in my power to relieve you from it!"

"I telegraphed early this morning for
equipment; and they should be here
this afternoon."

"That was considered kindness itself. You
must let me pay for all this. You
know I can't."

"But here's reason in all things." "That's
therefore, a little in my mind. Please,
Maggie, don't make me feel that I am
stranger to you. I am not a stranger to
you, and I shall be glad to see you
often. I have found the horse out more
than this for candy, flowers, and
senses. I have yielded everything,
haven't I? and, as I have yielded, I wish
to let a little of my fault to you."

"Well, then," she said, laughing and
blushing, "as from you of the family—"
"And from your deceased brother,"
he interrupted.

"She put her finger to her lips. 'That's
past,' she said. 'No more allusions.
We been sensibly last night, and I
certainly am very comfortable in my
gifts that I should present against even
from Henry. I wish to prove to you
that I am the Magdalen of old times as far
as I can go.'"

"I had understood, and they were
going slowly towards the stable,
"Maggie," cried the young man, "I
going with no better protection than a
rainside? I'm always a little of when
a horse like that is at hand. I am glad you have such a horse, and I
will be glad to see you often. I have
found the horse out more than this
for candy, flowers, and senses. I have
yielded everything, haven't I? and, as I
have yielded, I wish to let a little of
my fault to you."

"I have, but you cannot think that I
like it or approve of the diplomacy you
are conducting. It is a pity, even though
your motive be the best, that you
don't think you ought to be placed in
such a position, and would that it were
in my power to relieve you from it!"

"I telegraphed early this morning for
equipment; and they should be here
this afternoon."

"That was considered kindness itself. You
must let me pay for all this. You
know I can't."

"But here's reason in all things." "That's
therefore, a little in my mind. Please,
Maggie, don't make me feel that I am
stranger to you. I am not a stranger to
you, and I shall be glad to see you
often. I have found the horse out more
than this for candy, flowers, and
senses. I have yielded everything,
haven't I? and, as I have yielded, I wish
to let a little of my fault to you."

Whenever emergency occurred, he might
do all that was possible. The young girl herself was a presence not soon to be forgotten. Her eyes were slightly parted,
her lips slightly parted, and her whole
power, and her face, visible to the
powerful motions of the horse, grace
fully. She passed on down the main street, and then she turned, waved her
hand, and, with a smile, and with
her companion galloped away to the
stable. Several of Mr. Muir's acquaintances
came forward, offering congratulations,
and then they were seen to enter the
stable, in spite of her words to the contrary. He kept her eyes fastened upon Maggie, as she was in sight.
"Well," she said, "I have not ever
seen anything equal to this!"

"I have, but you cannot think that I
like it or approve of the diplomacy you
are conducting. It is a pity, even though
your motive be the best, that you
don't think you ought to be placed in
such a position, and would that it were
in my power to relieve you from it!"

"I telegraphed early this morning for
equipment; and they should be here
this afternoon."

"That was considered kindness itself. You
must let me pay for all this. You
know I can't."

"But here's reason in all things." "That's
therefore, a little in my mind. Please,
Maggie, don't make me feel that I am
stranger to you. I am not a stranger to
you, and I shall be glad to see you
often. I have found the horse out more
than this for candy, flowers, and
senses. I have yielded everything,
haven't I? and, as I have yielded, I wish
to let a little of my fault to you."

"Well, then," she said, laughing and
blushing, "as from you of the family—"
"And from your deceased brother,"
he interrupted.

"She put her finger to her lips. 'That's
past,' she said. 'No more allusions.
We been sensibly last night, and I
certainly am very comfortable in my
gifts that I should present against even
from Henry. I wish to prove to you
that I am the Magdalen of old times as far
as I can go.'"

"I had understood, and they were
going slowly towards the stable,
"Maggie," cried the young man, "I
going with no better protection than a
rainside? I'm always a little of when
a horse like that is at hand. I am glad you have such a horse, and I
will be glad to see you often. I have
found the horse out more than this
for candy, flowers, and senses. I have
yielded everything, haven't I? and, as I
have yielded, I wish to let a little of
my fault to you."

"I have, but you cannot think that I
like it or approve of the diplomacy you
are conducting. It is a pity, even though
your motive be the best, that you
don't think you ought to be placed in
such a position, and would that it were
in my power to relieve you from it!"

"I telegraphed early this morning for
equipment; and they should be here
this afternoon."

"That was considered kindness itself. You
must let me pay for all this. You
know I can't."

"But here's reason in all things." "That's
therefore, a little in my mind. Please,
Maggie, don't make me feel that I am
stranger to you. I am not a stranger to
you, and I shall be glad to see you
often. I have found the horse out more
than this for candy, flowers, and
senses. I have yielded everything,
haven't I? and, as I have yielded, I wish
to let a little of my fault to you."

MAS C. WATKINS.
UNCEMENT
PARTNERSHIP
READY-MADE CLOTH
class hand, and we have got arrived, and we guarantee durability. We respect
ON & CO.
COURTS OF THE CO. OF HALTON
Mar. 29, July 25, Nov. 27 10 12 8 3
13 15 9 16
16 11 14 9
19 13 17 12
with or without July, Tuesday 5th Jan.
11, and 6th October, at 10 A. M.
January, 6th April, 6th, and 8th days of each week, except on Saturdays and Sundays, at 10 A. M.
DEWAR, Clerk of the Peace.

THE CANADIAN CHAMPION
PUBLISHED EVERY
Thursday Morning
MILTON, CO. OF HALTON, ONT.
SAMPBELL & PANTON, PROPRIETORS.
OFFICE—On Main Street opposite the Town House.
TERMS—A year in advance or within three months of the expiration of the year will be charged.
RATES OF ADVERTISING.
1 Column 1 week $1.00
1 do 2 weeks 1.75
1 do 3 weeks 2.25
1 do 4 weeks 2.75
1 do 5 weeks 3.25
1 do 6 weeks 3.75
1 do 7 weeks 4.25
1 do 8 weeks 4.75
1 do 9 weeks 5.25
1 do 10 weeks 5.75
1 do 11 weeks 6.25
1 do 12 weeks 6.75
Business Cards of ten lines or less $3.00 per year.
The number of lines to be reckoned by the space occupied, measured by a scale of No. 10 Galleys and 24 lines for each subsequent insertion.
Orders for advertising advertisements must be in writing, otherwise the publishers will be responsible.
Any Special Notice, the object of which is to obtain the necessary benefit of any individual company, institution, or fund, will be considered an advertisement, and charged accordingly.
No special notice of any kind admitted among the local rates of less than 50 cents for first insertion, and 25 cents for each subsequent insertion.
Notices of births, deaths, and marriages, 25 cents each.
Transient advertisements ten cents per line, except those of first insertion, and which will be inserted at 50 cents for first insertion,
and 25 cents for each subsequent insertion.
Terms for work strictly cash.
To Subscribers—No paper will be stopped until the account is paid in full.
A post-office notice to discontinue is sufficient.
Legal.
D. DEWAR, Issuer of Marriage Licenses. Office in Town Hall, Milton. Also Agent for Life and City of London Fire Insurance Companies.
JOHN DEWAR, Barrister, Crown Court Attorney, Notary Public, etc., Town Hall, Milton.
D. GIBSON, Barrister and Attorney-at-Law, Solicitor in Chancery, etc., Office—Bechtel's Ck. Bk. 20.
OEHLSHOLM & BELLIOTT,
Barristers, &c.
OFFICE—First door east of Bank