Canadian Open site Glen Abbey ready for pros

On June 1, 1976, golf's Golden Bear Jack Nicklaus and 1975 Canadian Open champion Tom Weiskopf, officially opened Oakville's Glen Abbey Golf Course, the permanent site of the Canadian Open.

This July, the 1977 Canadian Open will unfold before thousands of spectators on the course that Jack built.

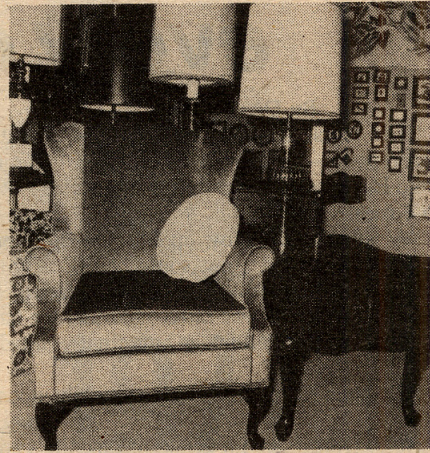

In the fall, Glen Abbey passed the Tournament Players' Association of America inspection, conducted a year in advance to ensure a golf course will be ready for a major championship the following year.

Only a few minor changes were necessary such as additional tees and a replacement of trees in key areas. An enlarged practice area was already completed to accommodate the pros at the Open and five or six tees were also enlarged.

Groundwork for the Canadian Open has been a phenomenal task — one that involved preparation of the course itself, and everything from accommodations for players, caddies and media concession stands and there are 17 different committees working towards the smooth flow of activities for the tournament. Co-ordinator of the Open, Geordie Hilton, says
