BLUE EYES.

Blue eves are full of danger-Beware of their tender glow! They'll leave thy heart a stranger To peaceful hours below! I warn you, men, give earnest heed! Let no bright eyes your sight mislead; And when blue eyes your glances win, Look not too deep-too deep therein!

> Blue eyes with soul are beaming; They'll look thee through and through With light of love they're streaming, So mild, and warm and true. And when my heart is sore distressed, And sorrow fills my lonely breast, Let then, blue eyes my sorrow win! What joy, what bliss I see therein!

Blue eyes from heaven are lighted With holy soul-born glow, To cheer the poor man benighted, And charm him out of woe. And when cold wintry clouds arise, And shroud in grey the sunny skies,

Then let blue eyes my glances win!

I find my sky-my day therein!

"Seven Years in ye Western Land."

A Scene at a Wisconsin Race Course. Two very decent nags were being walked over the course by their riders, preparatory to the contest, which was soon to take place. One was a bay horse, blind of an eye, who gave promise of doing some very respectable work, while the other, a neat little mare, applied rapidly among the bystanders, the wagers ranging from the "drinks" up to ten, twenty, and sometimes fifty dollars aside. Odds were given on the horse who seemed to be a favourite. When the time for starting had arrived, both horses were up to the scratch, and eager for the word. The jockeys, two half bread boys, were stripped to their boots and pants, and were, without exception, the best riders l
