FALL AND WINTER EGGS.

The price for eggs advances enough in the fall to make their production profitable, if the hens didn't show a decided inclination to drop off in their laying. It is this tendency of the hens to fall off in laying that makes the eggs go up in price, and not a plot on the part of the hens to stop laying when eggs are high. But as a rule fall eggs are more profitable than winter eggs. We have plenty of good food at hand for them, and there is no cold weather to stop their laying. What, then, is the reason for their falling off in numbers? It is because they have too much fattening food which they gather from the fields and gardens. We must remember that the fall is the harvesting time, and that nearly every plant has ripened its fruits and seeds. The ground is covered in every direction with seed, grains, berries and fruits, and the hens go forth and fatten on these. They secure an abundance of food, whether they are fed at home or not. They fatten up quickly, and get lazy and sleek, and then they begin to cease the laying hens up in runs or yards part of the day, where they cannot find so much food. Let them get all the exercise they can, and instead of turning them out in the gardens and fields early in the morning, let them scratch and work in the yard for their breakfast. They won't get much there, but the effort to find food will be good for them. Later, when turned loose in the fields, they will have a better stomach to digest what they may find. At this season of the year they need LUMBER, SHINGLES AND LATHS to be fed green bone, pounded shells, and other articles with lime, in them. The fruits and berries and seeds which they find in the fields will be fattening enough, but they do not contain the lime essentials that go toward forming egg shells.
