A SUBSTITUTE FOR RUBBER.

Natural Product in Some Respects.

Velvril is the name by which a new substitute for rubber and guttapercha is to be known. It is to be used largely for deep sea cable insulation, to take the place of rubber, The desirability of such a substitute being found is seen in the fact that one cable recently laid required over 500 tons of rubber, or one-fifth the annual output, for its insulation. The new insulator is a mixture of nitrated linseed or castor oil with nitro cellulose. This gives a homogeneous mass, the elastic and other properties of which can be modified by changes in the proportions of the constituents. A good imitation of Para rubber is secured by mixing two pints of nitrated oil with one pint of nitro-cellulose. Castor oil yields better results than linseed oil. The elasticity of the product is 25 per cent. It is said to be more durable than rubber, and it can be molded under heat and pressure, or worked by dissolving in any suitable solvent, and then evaporating the solvent. Velvril is claimed to be superior to vulcanized rubber, in that it is without action on copper. It appears to possess many advantages, but satisfactory information as to its cost of production is not yet forthcoming. The purposes

In fact the ache or pain is situated directly in the kidneys as the sufferer will find if he tries to rub the pain away with liniments, as he would were it a mere stiffness of the muscles.

Mr. W. S. Bushy, of Tweed, thought his case was of the latter kind. He bore with it for years, thinking it inseparable from his work. Finally, however, he found his mistake. He
