New Waiter at Boathouse Inn

Rumour had it that the lattest addition to the staff of the Boathouse Inn owed an old score, and was working it off in the capacity of waiter; and the general opinion among the customers was that he was a bad bargain even at that price. had a very long body and very short legs; this physical peculiarity being further much emphasised by a coat which had once been blue, the long tails reaching half-way down his podgy-looking calves. He wore a frowsy mouse-coloured wig and a bleary owllike expression of wisdom that evidently covered the most dense stupidity. He carried an ample supply of souff in his capacious waistcoat pockets; and, extracting it sometimes from the right pocket, sometimes from the left, with his thumb and finger, sonorously inhaled a portion and flu g away the remainder with a contempluous fairt of his flagers that sent a tiny cloud floating over the pewters and glasses in a manner that was peculiarly distressful to poor topers with a squeamish stomach. He invariably met the incoming coaches and post-chaises, holding forth to the travellers with a very strong Welsh accent upon the superior accommodaturned his attention to some one else. he appeared quite ignorant of the fact

The arrival of the foreign lady and gentleman had an effect upon the new waiter. For a moment his slipshod ma..ner seemed to drop from him, and he received the generous order almost with a acrity. He took souff from both pockets in quick succession, and gave a quick nod of acquiescence; but dropped a most at once into his customary listless manner, and shufiled from the room even more limply than the Dangers of South Africa. Trooper Fenton, of the British South Africa Police, is reported dead from wounds received from the claws and teeth of a lioness. This happened near Tuli, just across the Limpopo River from the Transvaal. Lions are getting scarce further south, but there are many other creatures asor even more-dangerous to our men

To lie helpless and bleeding on the dusty hillside, waiting through end less hours till the stretcher-bearers find and bring him in, is the terrible ordeal which must sometimes befal our wounded. But fancy, if you can, the horror of struggling feebly and vainly with shattered leg to crawl sonous snake whose haunt the soldier's fall has disturbed.

'According to a letter from a war correspondent, this is what has actually happened in Natal to more than one of the fallen, both Briton and pecially amongst the great boulders that strew the kopjes-snakes abound "The scourge of Natal," one writer calls them. Of these, three sorts are common enough. They are the puffadder, the cobra, and the rock-python.
