To a casual observer the exhibits in the Machinery and Electricity buildings do not differ materially from what can be seen any day in a big modern power-house. The 5,000 h. p. Allis-Chalmers-Bullock engine and generator comes in for its share of openmouthed wonder, as also do the other big units, while the quiet running little Curtis Steam Turbine, occupying about one-tenth the space and doing nearly as much work as the biggest of them, hardly gets more than a glance from 99 per cent of the visitors. Some people stop a moment to read the figures on the little Westinghouse Parson Steam Turbine set. These figures tell how many hours of continuous run this machine has made, and 1,680 was the least number I read This set is more powerful than one o the big engines in the National Portland Cement Cos. plant, and those who were there and made comparisons of this sort can see the finish of the reciprociating engine.
