The life at Rideau Hall, the otricial residence of the Governor-General of Canada, is social rather than political; it gives just an atmosphere of royalty in a democratic country, which though a colony in name is practically a free nation in fact. Earl and Countess Grey seem to have just the delicately difficult blending of aristocracy and democracy that make them admirably fitted for their rôles as representatives of the King in Canada. They are both free from that her husband has been so conspicuous, her domain being social and philanthropic; and she has been as enthusiastic as the Earl on the subject of temperance reform and a devoted co-worker in his Public House Trust for removing the worst features from English saloons.

Lady Grey is wealthy in her own right, being one of the daughters of R. S. Holford, the millionaire member of Parliament and owner of the palatial mansion, Dorchester House in Park Lane, one of the most famous homes in London. At the time of her marriage in 1877, Lady Grey and her two sisters were conspicuous in London for their beauty, rare intellectual gifts and their social standing. Since her marriage Lady Grey has spent little time in London, as she has followed the fortunes of her busband and been his constant companion in his various positions in all parts of the world and was with him when he made his splendid record in South Africa in the administration of Rhodesia after it had been taken over by the crown from the South African chartered company. The Greys have five children, the eldest Lord Howich, now twenty-six years old, who until recently acted as his father's private secretary, and four daughters, the eldest of whom, Lady Sybil, married Arthur W. Grenfell.

Lady Grey has regular features, a perfect English complexion, a sweet smile that seems a benediction, and the restful, calm manner of a nature thoroughly well poised and controlled. With a keen mind, a kindly tact that seems instinctive, a simple, sincere cordiality and graciousness, a life-time of closest association with the best social life in England, and the additional charm and ease that travel has brought her, Lady Grey should fit perfectly into the life of the Dominion and add to the traditions of hospitality that linger like a perfume round the memories of Rideau Hall.
