HOW INDIAN WOMEN LIVE.

Braving the Cold Weather They Go Hunting and Trapping.

With the mercury 45 degrees below zero, the native women of Missinabie, a small settlement on the north shore of Lake Superior, are living in tents in the woods, making their living by hunting and trapping. Most of them are Indians, and one of the remarkable features of their life is that, although they have been following this practice every winter for years, not a person has ever frozen to death. The women make as good trappers as the men, remaining all winter in the woods and coming out in the spring to sell their pelts.

The village, which has about two hundred and fifty inhabitants, was founded in 1886 by the Hudson Bay Company, but has since passed into other hands. During the winter months there is little life there, as the inhabitants in the fall push their way into the woods to the north from fifty to two hundred and fifty miles, and do not return until spring, when the hunting and trapping season is over.

Summer the Play Season. The summers have for years been the play season for the natives. For years it was the custom of the Indians to drink John Bull bitters, a concoction stronger than the farfamed "squirrel" whiskey used in the lumber camps of the North. But the Government has put a stop to this practice, and life is quieter as a re-

Strange Freak of Memory. There is a strange story of how Sir Walter Scott, producing "The Bride of Lammerimoor" during illness, was afterward found to have forgotten entirely what he had thus created. According to James Ballantyne, "the book was written and published before Mr. Scott was able to rise from his bed, coughs are best cured without med and he assured me when it was first that he did not recollect a single incihood, he still remembered, but he knew no more about the story he had written than he did before he began to write or even think about writing it." These facts were corroborated by Mr. Lockhart, Sir Walter Scott's son-inlaw and biographer, so that they are placed beyond question.
